Aunt Sarah, Table Grove, Ill., writes:

After all available earthly means had failed to deliver me out of trouble, I tried continuous prayer to our blessed Saviour and Heavenly Father. And I have been marvelously relieved of a great affliction. I know that God does answer prayer.

Mrs. Lucy H. Greene, Harriman, Tenn., writes:

I have read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of many answered prayers, and wish to add my testimony. I was overshadowed by a dark sin, and asked God for forgiveness. I vowed that if I were forgiven and reclaimed I would make it known publicly, that others might be helped, and thank God for pardon and peace. I wish to use my full name.

Chinese Destroy their Idols

One remarkable result of the influence of Christian sympathy in mission and relief work in China, has just come to light. In a letter to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from the Rev. Z. Charles Beals, a well-known American missionary, stationed at Wahu, Mr. Beals refers to the relief work which he and his associates have conducted among the native sufferers, who were reduced to beggary by the great Yangtse floods, which destroyed many lives and inundated a vast extent of territory. Mr. Beals writes:

Your letter, with check of $100, to hand, for which please receive my hearty thanks. I have put thirty of the most needy ones to work on a road to repair it. Most of them are poor widows and children, whose fathers and husbands were swept away by the flood. This amount will keep sixty persons two months. You know, a very little goes a long way here, as far as the natives are concerned. I will spend some of it upon the sick and suffering ones, and it will be a great blessing to them during the hot and trying summer months. The Lord bless and reward you for this.

The flood seems to have been a blessing in disguise, for it has shaken their confidence in idols, and they now are seeking after the true and living God. I have a church—or rather out-station—right in the flooded district, and the place is literally packed with hundreds at every service. We have over two hundred who are preparing for baptism. Last week, I baptized twenty-seven, and afterwards in a testimony meeting all said it was the flood that was the means the Lord used to convince them the idols had no power and were false. In Wuhu, one idol temple was given to me and all the idols were smashed to pieces, and then the wrecked idols dumped into a pool. Thus, you see, the walls of heathenism are, in a sense, falling. I am sure it is a forerunner of what we may expect soon in China.

Z. CHAS. BEALS.

A Golden Opportunity

READ in English and Spanish, from a flag-draped stand in the principal thoroughfare of Manila, the proclamation of amnesty constituted an event in the history of the Philippines. Six hundred prisoners were freed by the proclamation, and the exiles on the distant island of Guam were restored to home and freedom. Whole provinces have been turned over to civil control, and in a hundred different ways, the Filipinos are being made to realize the generosity of the nation which released them from the oppressive rule of Spain. It is a period of reconstruction throughout the islands, and there is reason to hope even for the early pacification of the Datto and Moro country, and that soon every province will be under peaceful and contented civil rule, as is now the case with all the provinces in Luzon.

Whatever doubts may have existed at the close of the war with Spain, as to the ultimate acceptance by the Filipinos of American methods and institutions, these seem to have been fairly answered by the enthusiasm of the natives, especially in the cities; over the new order of things. The sorrows of war have not been without their compensations. The Filipinos are learning the lessons of civil and religious freedom; they are availing themselves of the new educational opportunities we have afforded them; they are shaking off the ancient and oppressive control of the friars, who kept them in moral and intellectual darkness and fed fat upon their ignorance and superstition. "The friars must go," is the policy announced by our State Department, in its correspondence with the Vatican. They must go, because they are the enemies of education, and a stumbling-block in the path of a nation's progress. They have kept the native millions poor and ignorant, and in a species of abject moral slavery. Their continued presence in the archipelago would be a detriment to the American purpose of popular elevation and enlightenment, and inimical to the spirit of our institutions, whose blessings we mean to confer upon our foster-children as freely as they are enjoyed by our own. Therefore, the friars must go.

This condition furnishes Christian America's golden opportunity in the Philippines. Already freed, to a great extent, from the bondage of a superstitious slavery that verged on heathenism, the people are crowding in eager multitudes to hear the Gospel from Protestant lips. We have, thus far, only a mere handful of missionaries there, and a few Y.M.C.A. workers; but there is ample room for hundreds more. Every Protestant denomination should bestir itself to occupy a portion of this rich spiritual field. It is certain that, when the situation is fully understood, the millions of Filipinos will not be long neglected by their ancient religious oppressors, and that the field, now open, will be reoccupied in force by those who come after the friars. This would mean a continuance of the long night of spiritual darkness in the Philippines.

Let it be Christian America's mission to save the Filipinos. To do this we must act quickly, for herein lies the golden opportunity of our Protestant denominations. A rich spiritual harvest awaits the workers who will now be the messengers to carry to these people that greatest of all blessings, the free and glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ. Our land has already done magnificent service in foreign missions; but these Filipinos are now our foster-children,—our own adopted ones—and not strangers. We owe it to them, to ourselves as believers, and to Christ our Lord and Master, to grasp the opportunity and to bring this people into the Gospel fold.

Ornamental Christians

WE are not going to help men very much by simply standing in the midst of them without blemish—for ornament, as it were. If all Christians were perfect images of Christ in purity of life, it would not be enough for them merely to present themselves to the eyes of the unconverted, hoping thus to do them good and save them.

The upper galleries of Versailles are filled with portraits, many of them extremely valuable and ancient. They are likenesses of the greatest men of all lands and ages, drawn by the most famous artists. Yet most visitors wander through these rooms with little or no interest; in fact, after noticing a few of the most prominent pictures they hasten through the suite of chambers and descend to the other floors. One sees plainly the change when the sightseers come to fine paintings, where men and women are not inactive portraits, but are strenuously engaged. There the warrior, who was passed by without notice upstairs, is seen hewing his way to victory over heaps of slain; or the statesman appears delivering himself of weighty words before princes and peers. Not the men, but the actions, engage attention. Portraits have little charm when scenes of stirring interest are set in rivalry with them.

If we would be felt in the world, it is not enough to be passively, negatively good—to escape the finger of the scoffer so often levelled at professing Christians who fail to keep their garments unspotted. Not enough to be able to say, "I have nothing against anybody, and nobody can charge me with unbecoming words or conduct." If Jesus, our Master, had contented himself with that, there would have been no salvation wrought out for men. If we have his love we shall have his life, a love that lives and moves and has its being in practical efforts to help and save a suffering, sinful world.

Chivalry

THE age of chivalry lives in history as an era of pageantry and romance, of knights in armor wearing ladies' favors on their sleeves, of tournaments and battles, of the bold Lochinvar snatching his bride and riding away, of Enid in her faded silk, and sweet Elaine lying cold and white in her barge as she glides in death's panoply beneath the casement of the haughty Guinevere. That age is past. It was, shorn of poetic fancy, a most uncomfortable age to live in, a chilly, draughty, dirty, and unluxurious age. Better one modern cottage, with gas and hot water and a bath tub, than a half dozen medieval castles without a single convenience. But the age of true chivalry is never past, while the strong defend the weak, while the victors send relief to the vanquished, while wealth out of its abundance contributes to poverty in its want, and while ambulances fly to carry the sick and the wounded to hospitals where healing and help await them.

Secretary Baer's Resignation

THE announcement that Mr. John Willis Baer has resigned his office as General Secretary of the Society of Christian Endeavor, will cause widespread astonishment and regret. From one end of the land to the other, Mr. Baer is known in the Churches of all denominations, and his abilities, tact, and genial qualities are heartily appreciated. Christian Endeavor owes much to his indefatigable energy, his devotion to its interests, and his intelligent, loyal service. He was regarded as the very embodiment of its principles, and it will be difficult to conceive of the Society without his stimulating personality.

Many causes, it appears from Mr. Baer's statement, have combined to bring about his separation from the Society, with which he has been identified for twelve years past. Probably the chief reason is the interest which he has taken in the cause of Missions. He has been unanimously invited by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions to become one of its assistant secretaries. We can easily imagine that such an office must have had almost irresistible attractions for a man with whom the evangelization of his native land has become a passion. It is an office with unlimited opportunities for usefulness, and Mr. Baer can bring to it powers developed by the work he has been doing in his Christian Endeavor office. The churches will be glad that they are not to lose his acquaintance, but will renew it in a new capacity.

We heartily wish him success in the work he has undertaken, and are glad to learn that he retains his trusteeship in the Christian Endeavor Society and also his honorary office of Secretary of the World's Christian Endeavor Union. His long experience will therefore be available for the Society he has served so long and so faithfully, and he will prove an invaluable counselor to his successor.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Inspired Writers

—OH, THE BIBLE is so human; so full of heart-beats; so sympathetic; so wet with tears; so triumphant with palm-branches, that it takes hold of the human race as nothing else ever can take hold of it—each writer in his own style; Job, the scientific; Solomon, the king-philosophic; Jeremiah, the despondent; Daniel, the sagacious and heroic—why, we know their style so well that we need not look to the top of the page to see who is the author. No more conspicuous the uplifting wing of inspiration than the hand, the warm hand, the flexible hand, the skillful hand of human instrumentality.

Heroic Suffering

—MY FRIENDS, the brightest crowns in heaven will not be given to those who, in stirrups, dashed to the cavalry charge, while the general applauded, and the sound of clashing sabres rang through the land; but the brightest crowns in heaven, I believe, will be given to those who trudged on amid chronic ailments which unnerved their strength, yet all the time maintaining their faith in God. It is comparatively easy to fight in a regiment of a thousand men, charging up the parapets to the sound of martial music; but it is not so easy to endure when no one but the nurse and the doctor are the witnesses of the Christian fortitude.

Going Home

—OH, HOW MANY of us far away from home. All of us exiles. This is not our home. Heaven is our home. Oh, I am so glad when the royal exile went back he left the gate ajar, or left it wide open. "Going home!" that is the dying exclamation of the majority of Christians. I have seen many Christians die. I think nine out of ten of them in the last moment say: "Going home." Going home out of this banishment of sin and sorrow and sadness. Going home to join in the hilarities of our parents and our dear children who have already departed. Going home to Christ. Going home to God. Going home to stay. Where are your loved ones who died in Christ? You pity them. Ah, they ought to pity you. You are an exile far away from home. They are home.

Rain of Comfort

—THREE-FOURTHS of the inhabitants of the earth are engaged in a mighty struggle for bread. Nine-tenths of the population hunger-bitten if they stop to rest. The same grief that we saw at our depots in 1862, when the troops left for the war, you could see in England, Ireland and Scotland as the troops went forth to the Zulu contest. The same widowhood and orphanage that sat down in despair after the battles of Shiloh and South Mountain poured their grief in the Shannon and the Clyde, and the Dee and the Thames. Oh, ye men and women who know how to pray, never get up from your knees until you have implored God in behalf of the twelve hundred millions of the race just like your selves, finding life a tremendous struggle; for who knows but that as the sun to day draws up drops of water from the Caspian and the Black seas, and from the Amazon and the Mississippi, after a while to distil the rain, these very drops, on the fields—who knows but that the Sun of Righteousness may draw up the tears of your sympathy, and then rain them down in distillation of comfort o'er all the world.

The Burning of the Bible

—HERE IS a perfect Bible. It seems that instead of destroying the Bible, the chapters have been driven in and clenched on the other side by the hammers of eternity. The fact is, that the Book, so far from being destroyed, is going on until the fires of the last day, and when the fires of the last day are kindled, they will not find the Bible a bundle of loose letters, but a compact Book; and when the fires begin to burn on one side, they will burn from Genesis toward Revelation; then the other fires will burn from Revelation toward Genesis, and they will in all their course not find one chapter or one verse out of place. That will be the only time the world can afford to do without the Bible. What use, then, of Genesis, with its description of the making of the world, which is all destroyed? What use, then, of the prophecies? All are fulfilled. What use, then, of the evangelistic and Pauline description of Jesus Christ when we see him face to face? What use of the Book of Revelation, when we stand with our foot on the glassy sea, and our hand on the ringing harp, our forehead chapleted with eternal coronation amid the amethystine and twelve-gated glory of heaven, the emerald dashing its green against the beryl, the beryl dashing its blue against the sapphire, the sapphire throwing its light on the jacinth, the jacinth dashing its fire against the chrysoprasus, and we standing amid the chorus of ten thousand sunsets?

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Numerous Family

ONE of our subscribers in West Virginia, sends us the accompanying photograph of a grand gathering of five generations, which recently took place at Deepwater. The venerable lady in the foreground of the picture is ninety-two years of age. Around her are grouped her daughters, of whom she had ten, nine being still living. The next generation numbers eighty-six, many of them appearing in the photograph. Representatives of the fourth generation, great-grandchildren of the aged head of the family, were present. That generation now numbers one hundred and thirty-six. The little children in the picture represent the fifth generation, which numbers eighteen. In all, the aged lady has two hundred and fifty descendants. She retains the use of all her faculties, is able to read and write easily, and rode twelve miles in a buggy two days before the photograph was taken. She united with the Methodist Episcopal Church when she was a girl of fifteen years, and has been an active and useful member of the church all her life. Few are permitted so fully as does this venerable Christian lady to realize the promise of God to his ancient people.

He bleaseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly (Ps. 107: 38).

An Agreement Void

The Court of Appeals has just decided an important point of law in reference to oral agreements. A widow, suing her deceased husband's executors, claimed certain property absolutely, and the life interest in other property, besides a sum of money. She based her claim on a promise made by her husband before their marriage to make a will giving effect to the arrangement. He died suddenly before making a new will, and the executors declined to honor the promise, in the absence of documentary evidence. The widow's counsel set up the plea that her marriage with her husband was a performance on her part of the agreement, and as such constituted a valid claim which should be recognized by the Court of Equity. That plea was dismissed, on the ground that mutual promises to marry are presumptively based on affection, and cannot be accepted as evidence of the existence of a business arrangement, unless such an arrangement is set forth in the form of an ante-nuptial settlement. It would be well for society, if the presumption was always justified by experience; but we know that both men and women do marry for money, and that only too often love does not count as a motive. There is reason to fear, too, that sometimes, even in religion, the hope of reward operates more than love of Christ. Too many have the bargaining spirit that was seen in the first disciples.

Behold, we have left all, and followed thee; what then shall we have? (Matt. 19: 27).

A Boy-Patient's Friend

A boy eight years old was taken to the West Pennsylvania Hospital recently to be cured of severe burns he had received in a fire at Pittsburg, Pa. The firemen who rescued him from the burning house thought he would have died before reaching the hospital, but the little fellow was brave and patient and survived. His suffering was terrible, but he bore it like a hero. The other patients were interested in him on account of his courage and cheerfulness. But his wounds would not heal. At last the doctors agreed that it would be necessary to amputate both his legs, an operation that in his weak condition might prove fatal. There was just the one chance that the limbs might be saved by skin-grafting, if there was any one willing to furnish the skin. As soon as the fact was known, a stalwart brakeman, who was in the hospital recovering from an accident on the railroad, stepped forward and offered his cuticle for his purpose. The doctors told him a great deal of skin would be needed, as the wounds were large, but the brakeman told them to take all they wanted; he did not mind the little fellow, but he seemed friendless and his life was worth saving. His offer was accepted, and the child is now reported to be on the way to recovery.

When he grows up, if the doctor's hopes are fulfilled, how thankful he will be to the man who suffered pain to save his limbs and life! It may be hoped he will not be like those who hear with indifference that the Son of God suffered death to save them from eternal destruction!

Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness (I. Peter 2: 24).

A Dangerous Climb

A group of anxious men and women watched with intense interest the rescue of a child at Hoboken, N. J., last week. The railroad company has commenced the erection of a high building in Ferry street, and a tall steel framework has been set up. It is a hundred feet high, with the usual diagonally set braces. Among the children who play around the building was a boy of six years old, whose ambition prompted him to climb up the pillar. Watching his opportunity, when no one was looking, he started, and made his way nearly to the top. His mother had been looking for him, and was horrified when some boys, who had caught sight of him, it below the level of the entrance. It was in this section that the explosion occurred. It was followed by the dispersion of the deadly "after damp," which is fatal to any man who breathes it. The vibration of the explosion was felt throughout the mine, and all the men threw down their tools and hurried to the entrances. On their way they found several men overcome by the fumes and brought them to the surface. They saw dead bodies lying around, but dare not wait to bring them out. Several attempts were made to penetrate to the scene of the disaster, but the rescuers were driven back by the foul gases, and some of them nearly perished in their heroic work. Another expedition was afterward organized, which resulted in the discovery of twenty-two men who were still alive. They were brought up and taken to the hospital. Some of them were crazed by their suffering. The cause of the disaster is a mystery, but one of the officials of the mine intimates that it may have been due to carelessness. Quite recently it was found necessary to warn the new men against the reckless handling of matches, and one of them had been reprimanded for his carelessness in this matter. The manager says he seemed to treat it as a joke. It is a grievous thing if the cause was of this nature. Doubtless the wrongdoer lost his own life, but he brought destruction also on so many innocent men.

As a madman who casteth firebrands, arrows and death, so is the man that deceiveth his neighbor, and saith, Am not I in sport? (Prov. 26: 18).

An Interrupted Wedding

A very uncommon scene occurred a few days ago in Washington, D. C., at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church. A young couple informed the pastor that they wished to be married. The bridegroom produced a license made in due form, and he and the bride answered the questions put to them with apparent frankness. The pastor, being satisfied, then proceeded with the ceremony. He had read the form as far as the question to the bride: "Do you take this man to be your lawful wedded husband?" when, to the astonishment of all present, instead of the usual response, she answered emphatically: "No, I don't." The pastor asked: "Why not?" And the bride answered that it was too serious, and she needed more time to think it over. The bridegroom, pleaded and expostulated, but to no purpose. The girl flatly refused to be married, and when they quitted the church, it was noticed that they separated and went different ways.

It is not known what were the bride's reasons for her sudden change of mind. The bridegroom must have felt chagrined at his bride drawing back at the last moment, but he may congratulate himself that she did not allow the ceremony to proceed, and change her mind afterwards, as so many do, to the misery of their partners. Unhappily, similar instability is not unknown in religion, where the consequence is eternally disastrous.

If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him (Heb. 10: 38).

BRIEF NOTES

The French Parliament recently agreed, by 442 to 11, on a Bill providing that no one, in public or private service, shall be employed more than six days a week.

The great clock at Rouen has been measuring time and striking the hours and quarters for over 500 years, and, it is said, has been running all this time without interruption.

It is stated by Rev. Homer Stuntz that, in endeavoring to find a site for a Methodist church in Manila, the fact came out that no law was in existence by which non-Catholic bodies could hold real estate in those islands.

Salvation Army Drunkards' Friends Brigades have now been established in most of the leading cities in Great Britain. The leader in Glasgow is a Salvationist, who once endeavored to pawn his wooden leg to obtain drink.

The Chinese Scriptures are now printed with characters in 3 dialects and the New Testament in 4 more. In the Romanized Chinese the entire Bible is in 3 dialects, the New Testament in 5 additional, and portions of the New Testament in 9 more. In 17 dialects one Gospel is in Romanized print.

Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, the well-known traveler, said recently in reply to a question whether the Chinese made good Christians: "The very best. They stand before you as men, and when they have accepted the Christian faith, they will endure any torture rather than renounce it. If a man is converted, he will not rest content until he has converted others."

pointed to him. She gave a loud scream, and the little fellow, recognizing his mother's voice, looked down at her. The sight made him dizzy, and he was near falling. He dare not go higher, and he could not descend. His feet could not find the stepping places, and his nerve deserted him. There was a consultation among the people below, and finally a man went up with a rope which he tied around the child, and lowered him to the pavement, where his thankful mother clasped him in her arms. It may be hoped that the boy will not forget the lesson this experience should teach him. He will find in after life that there are places which it is easy to enter, from which return, unaided, is impossible. His boyhood memory should teach him to avoid them.

Afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it, carefully with tears. (Heb. 12: 17).

Death in the Mine

Johnstown, Pa., the scene of the terrible flood disaster of 1889, is again plunged in grief and horror. On July 10, there was an explosion in the great Cambria Mine under Westmont Hill, the full effect of which at the time of writing is not accurately known. It is feared, however, that more than two hundred men lost their lives. The mine is one of the largest in the United States. From one entrance to the other at the opposite end of the mine is a distance of nearly four miles. It is like a small town below ground, with main avenues and cross streets which divide it into sections. Near its centre one of the chief avenues makes a dip, having an area of about two hundred acres. It is one of the richest parts of the mine, and the miners have given it the name of the Klondike. Its depression brings

CURACAO'S QUAIN TITTLE TROLLEY

A TYPICAL COLONY RESIDENCE

IN THE HARBOR OF THE LITTLE PORT

WILHELMINA'S LILLIPUT COLONY

CURACAO, the tiniest of Queen Wilhelmina's possessions, and in many ways the fairest island in all the West Indies, amply repays the tourist who is fortunate enough to pay it a visit, as the writer did recently.

We arrived at the entrance to the harbor early in the morning, and waited for the pilot who should come off to us in answer to our whistle. - From the deck, we could see the little fortification on the right, a little pontoon bridge stretching across the entrance, and just beyond, the little city lying along both shores of the harbor.

As the pilot came out, the bridge was turned back, like a gate on its hinges, and we steamed slowly in. The lilliputian appearance of the place,—harbor, buildings, bridges, and streets—strikes one immediately. On landing, you feel half disappointed not to find the people in proper proportion to their miniature surroundings.

One young Miss of our party expressed the idea at once, by exclaiming, "This must have been Wilhelmina's pet toy."

The city is compactly built, and extends along both banks of a very picturesque lagoon. The buildings are all irregular in shape, and position. Even the little streets are irregular, some abruptly ending at the wall of a residence, or the side of a building.

Curacao, though small, is an active port, and a great many vessels trading in the West Indies make it a port of call. The majority of the people are black, but are industrious, hard workers, and appear contented and happy. They have mixed with the Indian race to a great extent, and in many of them the pronounced negro features are wanting. The women are adepts in basket-making and in straw-work of every description. The filigree work in gold by the Curacao jewelers is an art in which they excel.

The love and admiration of the people for their young queen are as true and honest as those of her people on the other side of the Atlantic, and their grief and apprehension for her during her recent illness were very touching. On the walls of nearly every house and hut, hangs a picture of their beloved ruler.

The white population is made up largely of Dutch, French, German and Spanish Americans, engaged principally in mercantile pursuits. Curacao boasts of being a city quite "up to date," and has its electric lights, ice plant, and street cars. Rapid transit is not a feature of its street railway system; but the mule and little car furnish the public with a safe and sure service. The pontoon bridge which closes the harbor's entrance and connects the two halves of the city, was a Yankee device of a former United States Consul to meet a public necessity, and was devised and constructed by him some years ago. It is not a handsome or imposing structure, but is a really clever piece of engineering. It rests on ten floats and is operated by steam. Its surface furnishes sufficient space for trucks and wagons, and one of the queen's smallest coins pays the toll.

..TINY CURACAO, ITS PICTURESQUE TOWNS AND ITS CONTENTED PEOPLE

We spent three days admiring the pretty bay, the bright, clean, little town, and chatting with the natives; but as we steamed away and saw the Yankee-built bridge slowly shutting us out, we gave a cheer for one of the brightest Americans Uncle Sam ever sent to the West Indies.

Where Giving Brought Blessing

That God blesses the cheerful giver is very beautifully illustrated in the following experience. Mr. C. P., Columbus, Ga., writes:

I have just been reading in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of the 18th, inst., the article, "How God is Blessing India." Please turn over the enclosed $150.00 to Dr. R. A. Hume, to be used for the famine orphans under his charge—a contribution from myself and wife. If we could, we would gladly give ten times as much. God bless the Christian mission work in India; with Dr. Hume, and all engaged in it. During the famine of 1900 I was earning but little; had no home, being merely a renter, and had a past due mortgage hanging over me. As we kept reading about the famine, I said to my wife, "Really, we ought to give something," so we sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD $2. As the terrible accounts continued to come, after two or three weeks we sent $10 more, and after awhile, we sent $100 more. We have amply tested and proved the promise, "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given will He repay him again," for the mortgage has been paid off, and we have a good home, and owe no man anything; and there is nothing that we think of with more gratitude than what we have been permitted to do for Christian mission work in India.

TYPES IN THE DESERT

The Ancient Worship Prescribed to Moses by God Himself

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE great Jehovah showed Moses the pattern of the worship which his people should offer to him, and which he could accept. The first element of worship was that God's people should give, not get (Ex. 25: 1-7). How many go to church on Sunday, to get what satisfies them, instead of to offer to God the adoration which will please him! Moses had already been used to pitch a tent, or tabernacle, where those who sought the Lord could go; but Moses alone is spoken of as entering into this tabernacle; and as yet God did not dwell in the midst of this people; the pillar of cloud descended when Moses went out to speak with God.

But God willed to dwell in the midst of his people, and the tabernacle which was to be erected must be "according to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it" (Ex. 25: 9). The first thought of God was that which should be innermost; the ark, made of wood and covered with pure gold,—a type of the human nature of Jesus Christ united with the Divine. The lid of the ark must be pure gold (all Divine), and of one piece with it, not made separately and joined on, two cherubim must be made. "The testimony," God's Word, must be within the ark; the cherubim a type of God's work in uniting created man with himself, must be without. "And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubim which are upon the ark of the testimony of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel" (vers. 10-22). This was to be the sole contents of the Holy of Holies, where Aaron alone might enter.

Without, in the holy place, where the priests alone might enter, there was to be a table made of wood and overlaid with pure gold, on which was to be set the "shewbread" and "presence bread," always. Then a candlestick of pure gold, made of beaten work, containing seven lamps to burn always (Ex. 27: 20). Christ the Bread of Life and Christ the Light of the world are here typified. Perhaps the branches of the candlesticks may typify the same as the branches of the vine, the oneness of his people with him. In the holy worship which God the Son rendered to the Father there was no intermission: the light of his life shone uninterruptedly; his flesh, the "living bread" which he gives "for the life of the world" (John 6: 51), is ever at the disposal of his Father, even now in heaven, for the world he came to serve. How far his ancient people might have taken the place now granted to "the Church which is his body," in being with him the light of the world, we can only know when, perhaps, ourselves, in another state of being, we see him bring out all his thought for Israel in his coming Millennial kingdom, and afterwards in the

Spreading the Gospel in Heathen Morocco

OUR BAND OF MISSIONARY WORKERS AT TANGIER

Mrs. Mattie D. Weiss, one of the party of American missionaries who lately began operations in Morocco, has sent us this interesting photograph of the missionary group. In the picture are included Mr. and Mrs. Currall, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss and the children of the two families. They do most of their traveling among the Moorish villages, on horseback. Many natives have already been won to Christianity by the mission.

"new earth." The tabernacle itself was to be made of ten curtains woven and embroidered, and coupled together with fifty clasps of gold, which should hold fifty loops made in the edge of the curtains. Over these fine curtains were to be two other sets, of rams' skins dyed red, and of badgers' skins, to bear the strain of the weather. Between the holy place and the Holy of Holies was to be a beautifully embroidered veil "of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen of cunning work, with cherubim, shall it be made." A curtain, also, was to be made for the door, and five pillars, overlaid with gold, should support the curtains, while the walls inside the curtains were made solid by boards standing up, held together by sockets of silver, through which a bar, overlaid with gold, should run, to hold all together.

Why did God take such pains to explain every detail of this tent in the wilderness? Was it not a witness of how he willed to tabernacle in the midst of his people, and how each of them, if they had understood their vocation, might have been an integral part of God's dwelling-place among men? He wanted a nation which should show forth his praise, by the presence of God making them to be a glory and a praise to him. They were to see themselves in the parts of the tabernacle.

Next, the brazen altar must be made for the sacrifices, by which alone the people could draw nigh to God. It must stand in the east of the tabernacle. But the altar without a priest would be useless, and Aaron must be clothed with holy garments, and must have two onyx stones, on each of which the names of the children of Israel must be engraved, that he may bear them upon his shoulder—a wondrous type of how our great High Priest, who is also the Altar and the Sacrifice, bears the names, the weight, the burden, the shame, of his brethren. And then the breastplate made of twelve stones, on each of which the name of one of the tribes of Israel was engraved. "And Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually" (Ex. 28: 1-30). What a type of him who ever liveth to make intercession for us! (Heb. 7: 25). The stones of the breastplate are virtually the same as the foundation stones of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21: 19; 20).

Called Higher

Word that another member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family has passed over the river, is received in this letter from Mrs. Mattie L. Miller, Clarksville, Mo., which says: "I took THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for my husband years ago, and praises be to God, Dr. Talmage's sermons were the means of his conversion. He died triumphant. For four long years he had been in feeble health and rest was welcome."

The JOY OF SUMMERTIME

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Deserted Husband

COUNTRY air for the children, and a change for the children's mother, leave occasional husbands very lonely during the summer solstice. "It is so silent in our house," wrote one such man, "that I can hear the sound of the fly's feet as he walks on the ceiling." Nothing, except the homeless cat that wanders forlornly around the vacant lots while the family that owns it is off enjoying life elsewhere, is as forlorn in feeling as the deserted husband. His wife writes to him every day, and the children send their little letters to "poor papa," but these attentions do not compensate for the deadly stillness of the house; for the wan, weird dreariness of unused rooms; for the comfortless cupboard, and the scurry of the mice along the empty shelves, when a man's wife is away from home. Amiable and resigned as the husband may be, unselfish and tender as most American husbands are, the solitude gets on a man's nerves, and is not good for him. The truth is that no one should be left all alone in a home. By some management the husband who must send wife and bairns to the country should have an aunt, or a mother, or at least a brother man or two to come and keep him company. If several men join their forces and live together while their wives are away, the summer loneliness will be mitigated, and they will be apt to take their regular meals in a degree of order and comfort at home.

Any one may be taken ill at night, when there is no one near to render aid. If this occurs to a man who is by himself in a city house, which stands between shut-up houses whence the inhabitants have temporarily flown, he may be in desperate straits before morning, or die without any helping hand held out.

Near every city there are pleasant places where families may board, and to which husbands may come daily. So that there is not very much excuse for the desertion of the business man in summer by his wife and children. A grown daughter may stay with her father, if need be, and take her outing later. Some way can be devised, if there is a will to devise it.

Common Mercies

The common mercies, air, sunlight, rain, food, and drink, a roof to shelter us, and a bed to lie on, and little things that are sweet and familiar in our daily paths, should move us to thanksgiving. Few of us are ever to have great and wonderful happenings in our pilgrimage, but we all have a thousand tiny blessings, springing like the white clover in the velvet grass, to make us glad we are alive. A wife's tender kiss at meeting and parting, a child's happy greeting, little voices of the babies at their play, the boys' school triumphs, the beauty of the young girl, the honorable wages of honorable work, are among the common incidents of life, for which we should give God praise. Nothing is more commonplace than a cup of cold water, but to the thirsty traveler on the road nothing is so grateful.

Eighty Miles From a Church

A Christian girl teaching school in Arizona, eighty miles from any church, is burning a beacon-light for God in her little schoolhouse. Don't forget her and others like her in your prayers. The faithful little school-teachers, trudging miles to their daily tasks through all sorts of weather, enduring uncomplainingly all conditions of hardship, are the true pioneers of civilization and freedom. Often they are our very bravest home missionaries, telling the boys and girls of Him who came to save themselves, living epistles known and read of all men.

Clever Sayings of Children

Treasure them up by all means, but as you would preserve intact your child's lack of self-consciousness, do not repeat them in his or her presence. It is very painful to meet a disagreeable and self-conceited child. "When are they going to talk about me?" said a little girl, after waiting some time for her mother and the company to introduce the expected theme. Parents of bright little children must not be over vain nor encourage their children in vanity. Unfortunately, precocious children often exhaust their cleverness when young and are dullards when grown up. For most children, it is both wholesome and happy to be kept a good deal in the background.

Never Too Late to Mend

A humorist, quoting this aphorism, added to it the little tag, "so there's no hurry." Unfortunately, the practice of most people who indulge in wrong and wasteful habits, shows that they are of his opinion. The fact is that if we are to mend our ways in any respect, the sooner we begin the better it will be for us. To-day you may break away from the indolence that saps your energy, or from the appetite that threatens your manhood, or the temper that your friends dread. To-morrow the cords that bind you will have another strand, and be of iron firmness.

A Child's Insight

Harry was a little bundle of mischief, and he went to Infant School. Coming home one day, his papa asked him how he liked his teachers. "Well," said the small observer, "they're all nice, but they're different. I pulled Dick's hair. Dick was sitting in front of me, and Miss Jeanie said, 'Harry, darling, don't do that.' I pulled it again, and she said, 'Oh! Harry, darling, don't do that. Don't you love me, Harry? I love you!' Another day, Miss Mae was teaching us, and I pulled Dick's hair again. Miss Mae said, 'Don't do that!' and when I did, she said, 'Don't make me speak to you again, Harry Jefferson!' The voice of decision was more potential here than the voice of loving persuasion.

AUNT PRUDENCE'S EASY CHAIR

- W. T. G. Beware of covetousness. It is the rust of character.
- W. S. If you can say nothing kind of people, be silent about their faults.
- COLLEEN. Your trouble is curable. What you need is rest. Take a nap every day before luncheon.
- DIETARY. Sweets are good in their place. A little candy after meals does no harm to the average child.
- LITTLE SISTER. Wait awhile. Your turn will come. At present your elder sister has the right of way.
- PARENT. Do not give a latch-key and a large allowance to your boy of fifteen, unless you want to ruin him.
- PUZZLED. A girl cannot consider a man her lover who devotes his time impartially to her friends. Some men are naturally devoted to the service of their women friends, and they have no wish to be the property of one. I wish girls were less solicitous about men in this line.

NANNIE'S PUZZLE

WEENIE Nannie looked into my face, the day that mother died, Her eyes were like the bluets, and her smile was like the dawn;
She pulled away my fingers, as I hid my eyes and cried;
"Why, tell me," said the lassie, "has she not to heaven gone?"

"I dinna see," she marvelled, "why you greet so very sair,
For grandmamma was tired, and she's only gone to sleep.
And 'tisn't as if none of us would meet her never mair,
For when she wakes, our Feyther will be there, his own to keep."

Wee Nannie's wisdom comforted and chided me, as then
I thought of heaven and all its rest, of heaven and all its love.
The bairns, they see most clearly; we but look with eyes of men;

They have the better vision, that is given from above.

ELLEN LINDSAY.

Two Aspects of the Case

"HOW it rains!" said Hugh, bouncing out of bed and running to the window. "It always pours when I am wanting to play base-ball."

"How it rains!" cried Mary, surveying with a frown the pretty ruffled frock she had laid out to wear in making calls that summer afternoon. "Rain, rain, rain; I think we've gotten under a wet part of the sky. It's just horrid."

"If you are going to see your friends, Mary," said the mother of both, the one who had already in the day reasoned with Hugh as to his foolish ill-temper, "you may do so in a rainy-day costume. There will be other times when you can wear your pretty clothes, dear."

Mary shrugged her shoulders. "No," she said, "I'll stay at home."

"Bless the child," said Aunt Sally, "may she never have any worse thing than that to do. It's a lovely thing to have a home like this to stay in."

Out of doors, the life that is inarticulate, but yet that calls in its own sweet way on the Lord, was taking the rain in a very different spirit.

"Good," cried the daisies, thrilling through stem and root, and perking up their bright heads, "good, here is the rain; we were so thirsty." Every grass blade among the millions grew greener and stronger for gladness. The fruits and grains that were parching up and shrivelling for want of moisture, shook out their leaves and their globes and spheres rounded out with joy. The whole happy world outside was one exultant, enraptured, ecstatic, accordant choir of praise to Him who sent the rain that Mary and Hugh did not want.

Crowns

In a New York shop the other day there was an exhibition of crowns. Among others was the crown, in facsimile, which was to have been placed on the brow of Edward the Seventh on that bright day in June, when, instead, the great king lay hovering between life and death.

The crowns are different in shape and construction, as the sovereigns of the world wear them; but they are alike in being heavy and uncomfortable, in glittering with jewels, and in symbolizing authority. Uneasy is the head that wears a crown. In past days more than one crowned head has rolled away, ghastly and fearsome, at the blow of the executioner's axe. Sleep does not always visit the king's head; the crown has brought him neither poppy nor mandragora. But when one comes so near an earthly coronation as King Edward did, and Jehovah cries halt! we who are of the dust and of the fast fleeting day, may well pause and kneel in deep humility before the King of kings. We hope ere long that the stricken King of England may be raised from his bed of pain, and receive the crown which his subjects long to see upon his head. Meanwhile, let us give our homage unto King Jesus, on whose head are many crowns.

A Caution

Every good housewife cares about her things, her carpets, chairs and curtains, and so she ought. There is no merit in untidiness, and people who take proper thought for things in season, have them. But your boy is worth more to you than your furniture, and your girl is more valuable than your finest sofa or choicest bric-a-brac. In devotion to articles that perish with the using, don't overlook the care that should be bestowed on, and the tenderness that should be lavished on the children. Never scold them for mere mishaps, and consider them more than you do the rugs or the pictures.

DAVID AND GOLIATH.

A Little Shot Put Old King Coffee Out Of Business.

When medicine fails, they sometimes send sick people away to another climate for their health. Sometimes, the climate does it, but more often they stumble on the proper food to take, and then get well.

A lady in San Diego tells of a friend who left her home each December, for the past two winters, to go to California for her health. She says:—"Almost all of her time was spent in visiting the doctor and sitting in a big chair and watching the clock to note the time for her next dose of medicine. Nervousness was her principal trouble, and with others of kindred nature, made life for her a burden.

On the occasion of her last visit, I begged her to give up the use of coffee, and use Postum Coffee. She replied that she could not stop coffee. I said no more at the time, but the next morning at breakfast, I passed her a fragrant, steaming cup of Postum, making it as it should be made. After that, I had no more trouble, and my friend drank no more coffee. But the most surprising part of the experience was the change that soon came over her.

We began to notice it within less than a week. In less than a month, her nervousness had left her, and in three months, she was a new woman in face, figure and health. I had not dared to hope for so much benefit, although I had been greatly benefited myself by Postum, but coffee to her system was simply poisonous, and I believe this is the case with many others. She returned to her home in December, and was married within less than two months after. She never fails to give credit to Postum for her health or thanks to me for teaching her to make it properly, and well she may, for Postum has done for her what travel, doctors and medicine failed to do." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

AFTER Hilda's new acquaintances had left the veranda, Immanuel stood gloomily looking at the seats they had occupied. He scarcely heard his wife's eager plea that he would enlarge their circle of friends, and especially bring her in touch with Miss Livingstone. The name broke the current of his thoughts like a discord in music, calling up unpleasant memories of the time when he had been near yielding to Miss Livingstone's charms. He turned his eyes upon his wife with a mixture of pity and displeasure.

"If you would call on them," she went on impatiently, "I am sure Mrs. Livingstone and her daughter would come to see me. I met them yesterday on the ocean drive, and you ought to have seen them look at me! Won't you go to-day, dear, just to please me?"

He had done many things to please her, she knew, so she was not prepared for the decided refusal to her request, which he worded in no uncertain terms. Poor Hilda! she was already finding her gilded apples bitter to the taste. Her coachman, her liveries, her gowns, her jewels, had elicited nothing but an occasional brief stare from the haughty dames whom she longed to know. She was ready to cry with vexation as she glanced sidewise at the moody face of her husband.

He roused himself to say coldly: "When did you make the acquaintance of all those men, Hilda?"

"Why, I knew Mr. Renton in New York; I met him at Mrs. Smalley's; he brought the others. Mr. Livingstone I've known ever so long. I think he is just as nice as he can be. He isn't a bit gloomy and dismal, and he likes me." She added the last words with a defiant lifting of her small head.

He wisely changed the subject. "Where is Armitage, Hilda? I haven't seen him to-day."

"I'm sure I don't know," his wife replied carelessly. "I suppose he is with his nurse somewhere. I don't want him now, anyway—I want to talk to you. Won't you please tell me how we are going to get acquainted with these people? It isn't a bit of use to have this house and all our pretty things if we can't have the friends we want. You used to know them—Mrs. Smalley says so. Don't you want me to have as good a time as you did?"

He moved uneasily in his chair. "I gave up society, Hilda, before I knew you," he said at last.

"Gave it up!" she repeated. "But how can you give up people you know? What did you give them up for? You might have known—" She stopped short with a vivid blush. "Was that when you came up to the farm?" she went on in a lower tone.

He nodded assent.

"But tell me, why did you come to the farm?" she persisted. "Why did you pretend to be poor, and dig and work like a laborer?"

"I have told you," he said evasively. "I wanted to use my life and my money in another way. You know how."

"Yes, but you could have done both—you were doing both; Mrs. Smalley said so!"

His eyes had assumed a hunted expression during this inquisition. This alter ego of his resembled a gnat in her persistency. He wondered vaguely whether all married life would be like this. Must he lay bare the inmost recesses of his soul to the inspection of the coldly critical blue eyes which were bent so pitilessly upon him?

"Hilda," he said in a low voice, "I was trying to avoid temptation; I wanted peace, and I thought I had found it."

"Yes, but what temptation? Was it a girl? Yes, I know it was!" She turned upon him with the air of a half-grown kitten who pounces upon her first prey. "It was some girl!" she repeated. "That Miss Livingstone, I am sure. Did she refuse you?"

He had flushed a deep, distressed crimson under this fire of indelicate questions.

He begged her with his eyes to desist. "You might just as well confess," she cried shrilly. "I could let you know that you were not the only one if I chose!"

"Hilda!" he murmured in a low, shamed voice, "I beg of you!"

She had the grace to blush as she lifted her eyes and beheld the beneficent presence of Mrs. Smalley standing on the graveled walk. "I had the coachman set me down at the gate," cried that lady, effusively. "I thought I would walk across your charming lawn and surprise you! We just arrived this afternoon."

Chapter XXXVI.

Unexpected Guests

WERE it the object of this chronicle to record the experiences of an ambitious woman, in her struggles to scale the difficult heights where the socially great have established themselves, it might be shown how Hilda learned many valuable lessons in the course of her endeavors. One who aspires to be a woman of fashion, is inducted, perforce, into the wholesome art of self-repression, an accomplishment which is closely akin to the more noble virtue, self-denial—that obliteration of the animal-self that the God-self may become manifest.

The God-self in Hilda was as much in the dark as ever; but the animal-self learned gradually to sheath its claws in velvet, and to assume the airs of heaven. Under Mrs. Smalley's kind, fostering care, the beautiful Mrs. Rossi was guided past the fatal rocks which were seen to threaten her frail bark in the last chapter.

"It is always most unwise, my love," said this prudent matron, "to know too many of our young men, amusing and delightful as they are. At first, I mean. One soon gets the reputation of being—just a little risque, don't you know? I could point you out half a dozen such women here" in Newport. They know positively every one of the men, and entertain them lavishly; but I am sure they would give their eyes just to get a bow from Mrs. Waldorf-Spencer."

"What, that cross-looking old woman!" exclaimed Hilda, unguardedly.

"My dear—you will pardon me, but you really must not say such things! I was so thankful to be able to secure the introduction. You must learn to appreciate things as they are. And I don't want you to know any more of these sadly naughty men till you've met their mammas. Then—but you shall see!"

So there were no more jovial groups to be found on the veranda of the Rossi cottage. After a time—a tiresomely long time, Hilda thought, a number of severely correct elderly matrons left cards. The diligent Mrs. Smalley expressed great delight at this circumstance. "Things could not be going better," she declared with embarrassment. Indeed, as a further proof of social success, Hilda perceived one day among her letters—actually, an invitation to a garden-party from the eminent Mrs. de Willoughby Smith-Jones. Her face lighted up with such a radiance of smiles and blushes that Immanuel laid down his newspaper the better to observe the pleasing phenomena.

"What has pleased you so much, Hilda?" he asked.

"We are asked to Mrs. de Willoughby Smith-Jones' garden-party for Thursday," she told him gleefully. "What shall I wear?" She was unfolding another letter as she spoke. It was a voluminous affair, written on pink paper, the lines crossed.

As her glance traveled down the first page the smiles vanished, and the bewildering color settled into a steady glow of anger. "Of all the cool impertinence!" she cried, tossing the sheet aside. "What do you think, Amelia Hurd has just married Jack Snider, and she says they are coming to visit us on their wedding tour. They are coming to-day."

Immanuel lifted his brows with a quizzical stare. "I thought Miss Hurd was your very particular friend," he said.

OUR COMPLETE SHORTHAND

Isaac Pitman's
20th Century
Revision

By Special Arrangement with Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, N. Y.

LESSON XV.—The Halving Principle

See Special Note at the end of this Lesson.

131. Light consonants are made half their usual length to indicate the addition of t; thus ache, achet; sect, sectt; Kay, Kayt; skate, skatet; paw, pawt; pate, pate; plate, platet; pout, poutt; bowl, bowl; bolt, bolt; bullet, bullet; more, more; most, most.

132. Heavy consonants are made half their usual length to indicate the addition of d; thus, ebb, ebbd; bow, bowd; gey, geyd; guide, guidet; glide, glidet; Grade, Graded; gray, grayd; grade, graded; live, lived; laid, laid; ease, eased.

133. It will be noticed from the foregoing examples that a vowel coming before a half-length character is read first, the same as before a full-length consonant; as, act, oft, act. A vowel coming after a half-length consonant is read NEXT to the primary letter; thus, tie, tight, note.

134. When a consonant is hooked finally, it may be halved to express the addition of EITHER t OR d; thus, paint or pained; plant or planned; tint or tinned; tents or tends; vent or vented; mounds or mounded; rent or rend; puffed, paved.

135. In words of more than one syllable, with certain exceptions, a letter may be halved to express the addition of EITHER t OR d; thus, between, Bedwin; rabbit, rabid; credit, crowded; collaret, colored; disappoint, despond; backward, forward (wd; contraction for -ward); dockyard (yd contraction for -yard), seated, suitet, stated.

136. The four consonants m, n, l, r, in addition to being halved to express the addition of t, are also halved and thickened to represent the addition of d; thus, mate, made, aimed, mode, tempt, timid, deemed, neat, need, sent, send, felt, felled, heart, hard, moored.

137. The forms ld and rd are, however, used only when these consonants immediately succeed each other, as paled, paired, mailed, married. When a vowel comes between l-d, or r-d, these consonants must be written in full; thus, pallid, parade, mellowed, married.

138. lt is written upwards; as belt, except after n, ng, w, kw, when it is written downward; as knelt, ringlet, dwelt, quilt.

139. The consonants mp, ng, cannot be halved to express the addition of either t or d, unless they are hooked, initially or finally; thus, impugn, impugnet, impended, slumbered, rampart, anger, angered or anchored. The double consonants lr, rr, cannot be halved for the addition of t or d, under any circumstances. In par. 136 it will be seen that the heavy half-length signs m, n, l, r are allotted to md, nd, ld, and rd.

1. Pet, pit, Tate, taught, kit, aft, east, shot, omit, hot. 2. Wit, await, light, alight, yet, plot, crate, treat, plight. 3. Bed, aided, edged, jade, goad, edged, mead, annoyed. 4. Old, erred, blade, bread, glade, broad, dread, greed. 5. Pound, fined, accident, unbent, inward, brickyard. 6. Meat, mud, night, Ned, admit, doomed, fillet, tailed. 7. Bailed, ballad, showered, charade, tarred, tirade. 8. Pelt, polite, kilt, melt, omelet, inlet, runlet, quillet. 9. Impound, dampened, lingered, hungered, drunkard.

140. The upward h must be written in words that contain h halved, with or without final circle or hook; as hat, hats, heat, hunt, hints, haft, heaved.

141. After the -tion hook, the stroke st may be written upward when it cannot be written downward; thus, excursionist, liberationist, salvationist.

142. The half-length r [] should never be written alone, nor with s only [] added. Write [] not [] rate, [] not [] write, [] not [] writes. It should generally be used finally for rt, and for rd when it is not convenient to write r; thus, dart, fort, lard.

143. Two half-length strokes, or two strokes of unequal length, must not be joined together UNLESS THEY MAKE AN ANGLE; thus cht must not be joined to cht for chit-chat; nor pr to pt in propped; nor k to kt in tactics, nor m to nt for minute. Detach the signs, or write the letters in full; thus, chit-chat, propped, tactics, minute. In ford, named, etc., the junction being evident, is allowed.

144. Half-sized t or d immediately following the consonants t or d is always disjoined; thus, tided, dated, treated, dreaded, hesitated.

145. Verbs written with the half-length principle form their past tense thus, fate, fated; chat, chatted; nod, noded; part, parted.

146. Verbs written by a half-length letter ending with a hook form their past tense thus, print, printed; plant, planted (to preserve the straightness of the stroke) stint, stinted; acquaint, acquainted; grant, granted; vant, vanted.

147. When a word ends with t or d followed by a vowel, the letter must be written in full, and not indicated by the halving principle; thus guilt, guilty; dirt, dirty; loft, lofty; fault, faulty; mould, mouldy.

148. The circle s, as already explained (par. 62), is always read last when it is written at the end of a word; thus, fun, punt, punts; join, joint, joints; frown, front.

At this stage of his study, the student should read as much shorthand as possible, for practice in reading is second only in importance to practice in writing shorthand. It is in this respect that the student of the Isaac Pitman system has an advantage over writers of other systems, there being more shorthand literature in the hand is to the brain of the thorough student. The intelligent reading of well-written shorthand recommended to purchase Esop's Fables, or Easy Readings, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand. Either of these works will be sent postpaid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Or letters should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XVI., will appear in the issue of August 6.

Picture Sermons

Sometime ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD printed an article descriptive of the "Children's Church" in Brooklyn, conducted by Pastor Dennett, of the Tabernacle Baptist Church in that city. At those novel services, pictures and the power of Gospel song, were the principal means of reaching the hearts of the young auditors. Pastor Dennett has now applied the same unique method of religious teaching in dealing with adult audiences. On a recent evening, over one thousand persons gazed entranced upon the pictures which illustrated a discourse on "The Wandering Sheep." These pictures traced the career of a wandering boy from childhood to the grave. Then came a series of beautiful pictures, illustrating the story of the Good Shepherd. The closing song, "The Ninety and Nine," was illustrated up to the very last verse, while the singer proceeded. Picture-preaching furnishes a new idea for summer evangelical work, and there are many localities where the novel method can be introduced to advantage.

RHEUMATISM RELIEVED Through the Feet.

A Unique and Common-Sense Method of Treating Rheumatism Without Medicine —Relief is Immediate.

The makers of Magic Foot Drafts want the name and address of every one who has Rheumatism.

Send us your name and we will send a trial pair of drafts to you—on approval, without a cent in advance.

If you are satisfied with the relief and comfort they give you then send us One Dollar. If not, don't send us a cent.

The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet, without the least inconvenience, drawing out and absorbing the poisonous acids in the blood. They also exercise a gentle counter-irritant effect, soothing and relieving the pain in every part of the body.

Magic Foot Drafts have a record, in our home city of Jackson, Michigan, where some very bad cases have been encountered, of permanent success in nine out of ten cases.

The chances are nine out of ten that they will relieve you.

We have been sending these drafts everywhere on approval for many months. Already they are in use in twelve countries outside of the United States.

Isn't it self-evident that our policy of sending on approval to everybody would be ruinous if Magic Foot Drafts didn't relieve Rheumatism?

Isn't it worth your while to try a pair, since it doesn't cost anything?

Send us your name to-day—we'll send the drafts by return mail, and will also send a valuable booklet about Rheumatism—free.

CALL TO SEPARATION*

A Separation of Soul Rather than of Body. Involving Contact with Evil Without Subjection to it . . .

FROM the early days of Christianity the problem of separation has been recognized as one of the most difficult in practical religious life. It would be simple, if we could adopt the method of the Roman Catholic Church. The monasteries and nunneries do furnish separation, but the Protestant conception of the call to separation is something entirely different. It is a separation of soul, rather than of body. Christ, praying for his followers, said expressly that he did not ask for them to be taken out of the world, but that they might be kept from the evil. This is a much more difficult matter. To be in the world, associating with the people of the world, exposed to the world's temptations, engaged in the world's business, yet having a life apart from that of the world, not controlled by the world's principles, nor actuated by the world's motives, in the world, but not of it. This calls for higher qualities, stronger resolution, more vigorous spiritual life. Even the apostle, who wrote the strong appeal associated with the Topic, qualified it (I. Cor. 5: 9, 10); for, as he points out, a complete severance of relations with people of evil life would involve withdrawing altogether from the world, which he did not wish his readers to do. He wished them to continue their life in the world's pursuits, yet keeping aloof from all that was defiling. It is the same problem that appears in Christ's prayer. Not only the rock unmoved by the lashing of the waves, but wheat growing among the tares.

Separation, however, there must be and ought to be. It is inconceivable that a man in whom the Christ spirit occupies the place that is its due, should voluntarily choose his most intimate associates from among men who have not that spirit. An artist may live on affectionate terms with his family, who care nothing for pictures or statues; an enthusiast in music may have friendly relations with people who do not know one tune from another; but the friends whose society he enjoys are those who have kindred tastes, who are drawn to him by love of a common object. All the obligations of domestic life may be met, the man may be a good son or brother, but those persons who come nearest to him are those who find pleasure in the same pursuit, who admire the same things. In a miscellaneous social party, it will be noticed that, gradually, groups are formed, one of which will have politics for its topic, another business, another fishing or hunting, and while all the members of the groups may be on excellent terms, they naturally gravitate to the circle which is discussing the subject in which they, respectively, are interested. When, therefore, we find that a man's chief associates are irreligious men, we are justified in doubting if religion dominates his soul to any great extent.

It has been said that a sure test of a man's character is what he will do, if he is in a town in which he has not a single acquaintance, and has an unoccupied evening on his hands. Being absolutely free from all constraint, where will he go to spend his evening? Our novelists have been diligently inculcating the conception of all men being a mixture of good and evil, that no man is to be stigmatized as altogether bad, for he has good qualities in him, and no man must be considered altogether good, because the best have faults and imperfections. There is a basis of truth in the contention, but it does not obliterate the deep line of division between those who are sincerely striving to become better, and those who are careless of becoming worse. If our friend in the strange town belongs to the former class, he will inevitably seek out a resort in which he hopes to find men like-minded, intent on the same aspiration. A man who has passed from death to life, has undergone a change so radical that all his tastes and desires are affected by it. He may be as good a lawyer, or doctor, or business man as his neighbor, but the dominating force that controls him involves separation from people who know nothing of that force, and attracts him to people who have experienced its power. It is a law of human nature, and if anyone discovers that evil associations are congenial, the fact shows that he has need of very strict self-examination.

PLEADERS FOR OUTINGS

If generous readers who co-operate with us in giving outings to children of the tenements could read the letters of appeal and gratitude that come to this office, could see the anxious and bright faces crowding elevator, hallways and rooms at the Bible House, could hear the babble of glad voices as crowds of little folks start off to Mont-Lawn, could witness the happy arrival there, and the joyous ten days that follow, they would realize more vividly than from any printed page the blessing and the beauty of the work that they do for the little ones. The following letter is from a missionary who sends many detachments to our Children's Home:

Thank you so much for permission to bring fifteen children for outings on the 26th. I will have a hard time picking out that number from the many wanting to go. They all seem pitifully needy and deserving. I wish some big-hearted rich man or woman would endow that Home and make it possible for you to care for thousands where you care for hundreds.

A Sunday School teacher writes:

For a few years past you have kindly sent some of our children to your Home at Nyack. Our pastor advises me to ask the same privilege this year. Some of our children are very poor. I know they enjoyed going before, and I think it did them good. Can you take about twelve for us?

A mother says:

Kindly let me know if there is a chance to go to the country Home this summer. I have three children. Two are in poor health and would be greatly benefited if you could let them go. I have to go out to work doing sewing, so the children do not get the care they ought to have. I have heard of the great place at Nyack, where the children go in the summer, and am in hopes mine can go there.

Widows and working-women beg for their children. Little ones beg for themselves. Will you help us help the children? Only $3 gives a child a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn; $6 sends two; $9 three; $36 twelve, and so on; $21 supports a cot for the summer. Cash should be sent to this paper; garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Elim Home's Good Work

The Elim Home for Christian workers at Bell Island, Conn., is again opened, and has among its guests this season a number of foreign missionaries now home on furlough, and for needed rest and recuperation. There are also at the home a number of city missionaries and other workers, whose incomes will not enable them to pay the prices usually charged at summer resorts. Rev. Wm. James, founder of Elim Home, is extending the work by the addition of a cottage for wearied and sickly tenement mothers and their babies. Elim is a great and much needed benevolence, and is supported largely by outside contributions. Any interested friends may address Mr. James, at Bell Island, South Norwalk, Conn.

A Shipment from Ward's

There must be considerable satisfaction to every man when he realizes that he has done something wise and creditable, especially when it directly concerns the welfare of himself and family. Here is a man who is hauling a shipment home, content with the knowledge that all his supplies for several months have been purchased at wholesale prices, or in other words at a saving of about 30 per cent over his home prices.

He has no cause to worry as to what he will find inside the boxes. He has received shipments from us before and knows that everything will be found first-class and exactly as represented. Even if something is wrong, he knows that no firm in the country is more anxious to make it right than we are. We have customers everywhere—in every nook and corner of the United States. Beyond a doubt some of your neighbors deal with us. If you are not a heavy buyer, why not join with a neighbor and get your supplies by freight? It only takes 100 pounds to make a profitable shipment.

You may need a catalogue to start with. Our 1,000 page catalogue containing over 70,000 quotations and 17,000 illustrations will be sent on receipt of 15 cents to partly pay the postage. This catalogue is already in the homes of over 2,000,000 careful buyers and should be in your home also. Send for it to-day.

THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA brings the history of Science, Literature, Invention, Commerce, Geography and Discovery, and the Mental and Moral Development of the Race practically down to date. All the Recent Discoveries and the Gigantic Growth of Commerce and Manufacture, are Intelligently and Faithfully Recorded.

In dealing with the Great Commercial Centres of this Country, the editors of THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA have with great care, and at enormous expense, obtained the Statistics of the Growth and Development of Population and Manufacture, direct from the Civic Authorities, the Board of Trade, and the Chamber of Commerce in each city.

THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA answers Every Question, however abstruse. A Digest of all Knowledge from the Earliest Time is contained within its pages, and no person, however untutored, provided he can read, need lack for full information on any subject within the scope of human knowledge, once he is the possessor of this great work.

THE WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is very handsomely and durably bound in modern silk finished cloth with genuine gold stamp.

These Twelve Large Octavo Volumes, aggregating nearly TEN THOUSAND PAGES, make a most imposing array, Attractive enough to Ornament the best and costliest library in the world. No Two Hundred Dollar Encyclopedia can make a better exhibit on the book-shelf, and the ownership of this great work, a Complete Library in itself, will rank its possessor among the intellectually progressive men of the day.

619 COLLEGE GIRLS FROM 80 COLLEGES, AND 350 WOMEN FROM THE BUSINESS WORLD

FROM June 27 to July 16, the Tenth Eastern Conference for Young Women, under the auspices of the American Committee, was held at Silver Bay, New York. There is no more picturesque spot than this on the banks of Lake George, and the place, with hotel, tents, auditorium and lecture rooms, is very convenient for religious conferences.

This year has seen the first representation of Young Women's Christian Association work there, and it was found well to divide the Conference into sections, the first, from June 27 to July 6, being given over to students, and the second, July 8 to 16, to city Association work. Six hundred and nineteen college girls, from eighty colleges, thronged the first section, and they were followed by three hundred and fifty young women from the business world, in the second.

Among the speakers were Rev. Wm. Merle Smith, D.D., Ex-Chancellor Wm. F. McDowell, D.D. (who presided at the Student Conference), Professor Wilbert W. White, Robert E. Speer, Rev. John H. Denison, Dr. and Mrs. Howard Taylor, Mr. Don O. Shelton, Mrs. Shurtleff, Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, Miss Caroline Palmer, Miss Effie K. Price, Mrs. John R. Mott, Mrs. Helen Barnes and others. The meetings in both sections of the Conference were impressive, both for the numbers present and the interest shown. A deep earnestness characterized every service.

But Conferences would be incomplete without opportunities for recreation and outdoor life. Boating, driving and walking made the afternoons pleasant, and in each section, one afternoon was given up to a field-day time, when colleges or associations paraded with their banners, sang their songs and gave their favorite yells. The photographs, reproduced on this page, show the college girls as they appeared July 4th. In the smaller group are shown some interesting delegates from foreign lands. On the platform, standing together, these daughters of the East and the West are a demonstration of Young Women's Christian Association work, and what it stands for.

Silver Bay is an ideal site for a Conference of this character. From the wide hotel piazzas, one commands a view embracing a wonderfully beautiful stretch of water, north and south. Away off to the rear, the western hills rise to Catamount Peak, which is so steep as to be practically inaccessible, except by a trail that experienced guides alone can follow. From the summit of Catamount Peak, a splendid scenic panorama lies before the eyes of the delighted tourist. But along the well-wooded shores of the Bay itself, the roads are excellent, and there are many pleasant and shady drives. The entire region is a paradise for the amateur photographer. There are a number of pretty cottages alongshore, in which some of the guests stopping at Silver Bay are housed. A notable feature about the whole settlement is the fact that it is a strictly temperance place, the strongest draught being the water from the mountain springs.

On the waters of Silver Bay (about twenty miles from Caldwell, the southernmost point of Lake George), we see at this season, a fleet of pleasure and fishing craft. Passenger steamers, making regular trips, seem to bring this beautiful wilderness retreat into close touch with the civilized world. It goes without saying that during the stay of the Conference members, every picturesque spot on the borders of the lake has been thoroughly explored. Each day has afforded its quota of outdoor enjoyment, and the cool, bracing temperature has contributed toward making the outing a memorable and profitable one to all concerned.

The Adirondacks are at their loveliest in July and August—the whole region swept by pleasant and invigorating breezes, which temper the heat of the sun by day, and make the nights restful and invigorating. It is probably the finest region in the East for fishing and outdoor sports by land or water. Seldom has the quiet of these wilds been invaded by such a gathering as that which has just closed its sessions. All of the thousand women delegates to the Conference are charmed with their summer experience at Lake George, and they return to their various spheres of duty brightened and encouraged. To all, the Conference has been an inspiration, and the meetings have awakened a deeper and livelier interest in women's activities in education, religion and benevolence.

THE GOSPEL FISHERMAN

TEXT—Matt. 4: 19

"Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men"

ARE you a fisherman? "Oh, yes," you answer, "I have been a fisherman all my life. As Isaac Walton, the 'Father of Angling,' used to say, that true fishermen, like poets, were born, not made, so I was born with a love for the rod and the reel. As a little boy, many and many a time I have been late for school, because I loitered on the way, under the shadow of the old wooden bridge, to cast a crooked pin used for a hook. Now, that I am grown, I love to go back to the scene where I was born. I love to wade in the old familiar brook, and catch the speckled trout. I love to take a boat and pull out into the river which flows through the valley where my father is buried, and try to coax to my hook the black bass and the timid perch."

No, my friend, you are not a true fisherman. A true fisherman is one whose life employment, not his summer vacation, is devoted to catching fish. You are no more a fisherman than William M. Evarts was a farmer. Mr. Evarts, for recreation, used to play at farming. He used to take the money which he made as a lawyer in New York City, and put it into his Vermont farm. But Mr. Evarts never made a living off his Vermont farm. Farming was such an expensive luxury to him that, one day, while he was entertaining some fellow-Senators at his farm, he offered them in one hand a glass of milk and in the other a glass of champagne, as he said, "Take your choice, gentlemen; they both cost me the same." There is just as much difference between the man who makes his living by fishing and one who fishes for sport, as there is between the man who farms to make a living and the man who farms for recreation. It is the difference between work and play. It is the difference between the man who sets sail in the fishing smack from Nantucket or New Bedford, and spends six long months off the banks of Newfoundland, facing the dangers of tempest and collision, and the man who paddles about in a canoe on a quiet stream. It is the difference between the man who is ready to defy the dangers of Lake Galilee—the most treacherous inland sea in the world—and the man who stands upon a rock on a sunshiny afternoon, and casts his expensive line into the brook for a few hours' pastime.

Consecrated Lives

Now, the two brothers, Peter and Andrew, to whom Christ spoke the words of my text, upon the shores of Lake Galilee, were real fishermen. They were not dilettanti. They did not go out into the country for a few days, with a hundred-dollar pole, to catch a dollar's worth of fish; but they made fishing their life's business. They belonged to what is perhaps the bravest class of men on earth—the fishermen. Christ, when he saw them mending their nets, turned and said: "Come, leave your nets and follow me. Give up your work of catching fish, and I will teach you how you may use your energy and bravery and consecration, and will make you fishers of men. Come with me, and I will make you fishers in the great troubled sea of humanity, and will call you my Gospel fishermen."

The true Gospel fisherman is a one-purposed man, whose life is dedicated to the single object of saving souls. Every sportsman knows that it is an impossibility for a successful fisherman to think of anything else but his fish at the time of fishing. He cannot plan about business and attend to his line. He cannot read a book and watch his bait. He cannot dream of the woods and troll at the same time. When a real fisherman fishes, he concentrates his entire attention upon his fishing and excludes every other thought from his brain. Because fishing is so fascinating and absorbing, some of the greatest men of the world have found their recreation in the sport. Daniel Webster, whom the Massachusetts fishermen used to call "Black Dan," because he became so sunburnt when fishing with Sargent S. Prentiss, of the shoals of Nantucket, used to forget his senatorial cares in watching his line. Christopher North, the intellectual giant of old Scotland, prolonged his life far into the eighties by his habit of running away from Edinburgh, with his rod and reel. Chester A. Arthur and Grover Cleveland, at every opportunity, would exchange the comforts of the stately White House for the absorbing delight of baiting a hook and casting a line.

So, a man cannot become a true Gospel fisherman, unless he consecrates himself, body and mind and soul to the one purpose of saving men. He must live and eat and breathe and sleep only for the hope of bringing sinful men and women to Christ. He must be as deeply absorbed in the work of saving souls as was John Knox, who used to arise frequently in the middle of the night to pray. And one night, while he was pleading with God to help him in the work of saving souls, his wife chided him and told him to come back to bed. The great reformer turned and said, "Woman, how can I sleep when my country is not saved?" Then he continued his supplications with this earnest cry: "Oh, God, give me Scotland or I die!" The Gospel fisherman must be as wholly absorbed in the work of saving souls as Thomas A. Edison is absorbed in his inventions. He has a couch placed in his laboratory, and there he often stays for days alone, working and planning, forgetful even of his meals, until his wife comes and persuades him to eat. The Gospel fisherman should become as fully absorbed in the work of saving souls as the enthusiastic fisherman who arises early in the morning and fishes all day long, is utterly oblivious of the flight of time. Christ said to Peter and Andrew, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." That means: "Give yourselves up, body, mind and soul to my service, and I will make you even more successful in saving souls than you are now successful in drawing out the piscatorial beauties from the waters of Lake Galilee."

Single-Minded Workers

Never was I more impressed with the thought that, in order to be a true Gospel fisherman, a man must surrender himself body, mind and soul to the Master's service, than when, some years ago, I went with a party of gentlemen fishing for Atlantic flounders. At that time I was not much of a fisherman. I was so absorbed in the beauties of nature that, when I threw out my line, I would forget all about it, and the fish would come and nibble off the bait and swim away. In the meantime, I was admiring the curving waves; I was watching the winds pile up the clouds into valleys and mountains and domes and arches and fortresses and obelisks; I was watching the sea-gulls take their morning baths or swoop down to clutch a fish in their talons, and then, with a wild cry start away for the nests where their young were clamoring for food. And as I watched those sea-gulls, my mind wandered on and I soliloquized: "What if death had slain my father and mother when I was young, just as a cruel marksman, for mere sport, might shoot yonder bird? Would I then have died, as the bird fledgelings would die, of starvation? Or would I have lived to grow up a Christian man or have fallen into crime and finally been put behind iron bars as a convict?" And thus I dreamed the whole day away and only caught one small fish! But, right alongside of me, was a man who had the same kind of bait, the same kind of a line, and practically the same position. He differed from me only in the fact that he put his whole body and mind into his work. He did not go down New York Harbor to watch the clouds, or the birds, or the waves. He went to fish, and he fished until the perspiration rolled off his face in streams; he fished until his hands were dirty and till his clothes were dirty. But the result of putting his whole force into his work was a basketful of at least fifty or sixty big flounders. So, my brother, if you and I are to become one-purposed Christians—if we want to live to save men—we must surrender ourselves, body, mind and soul, to the service of the Lord Jesus Christ. We must leave our worldly nets down by the shores of Lake Galilee, and follow him. Jesus demands that we make his service a life's consecration, not a Sabbath's recreation. He demands unceasing toil, not a summer's sport.

Courage Needed

The true Gospel fisherman is a brave man. We have been taught to regard the soldier as among the bravest of men. True, it needs a brave heart, to stand unblanched amid a storm of shot and shell, and to walk up to the cannon's mouth when the bullets are falling around like hail pattering upon the pavements. But the soldier never has to face great dangers continuously like those the fisherman has to meet. I suppose that among all the different classes of men, there is not one among which the destruction of life proportionately is so great as among the men who make the harvest of the sea their avocation or life-work.

During a recent journey across the Atlantic, and after we had been out a couple of days from New York harbor, I saw two men pointing to a dark cloud ahead. I heard one of them say, "We are going to have a bad night. That is the Newfoundland fog bank." Soon the thick mists began to settle around us. All that night the gloomy fog-horn blew. I said to the commander of the Cunarder, "Captain, why do you blow that terrific fog-horn. Surely the danger of collision with a passing steamer is comparatively small." "Ah," answered the captain, "we are blowing the fog-horn chiefly to warn the fishermen. All about these waters are hundreds of little fishing smacks. The fishermen come here and anchor. They stay month in and month out, until they catch their cargo, and scores and scores of these poor fellows are run down every year. We want to warn them, if possible, that we are coming along." Go to any of the little fishing towns along the rocky coasts of old Scotland. There you will find women who have lost fathers and brothers and husbands and sons in the awful dangers of a fisherman's life. Every seaman will tell you that are comparatively nothing, if there are only sixty fathoms of water under the ship's keel. But the fisherman rarely puts out to the deep sea. He must fish comparatively near the shore. Then the storms come up and threaten to drive the frail craft upon the rocks. Then the fogs settle so thickly that the steersman can hardly see the prow of the boat from the stern. Yes, the true fisherman's life, whether it is found on Lake Galilee, or off the coasts of Scotland, or in the Newfoundland fogs, is a life of overwhelming danger. Brave must be the man who would follow so perilous an avocation.

So the Gospel fishermen, too, must be brave men! They must be as courageous as were Peter and Andrew, who, to become Gospel fishermen, laid down their lives for Christ. They must be as brave as the heroic Father Damien, who, in order to minister to the sick and the dying, went to Molokai, the Leper Island of the Pacific, and himself became a leper and died. They must be as brave as that Salvation Army girl, who stands and sings and prays upon the street corner, amid the scoffs and the ridicule of the passers-by, and who penetrates the dark alleys, humanly unprotected, to seek out souls for Christ. They have to be as brave as that young Christian clerk, who goes from saloon to saloon giving out gospel tracts and leading in prayer where the proprietor will allow him to pray. Ah, it takes courage to be a Gospel fisherman! It takes courage to launch out into the deep, and to let down the Gospel net and become fishers of men, when the hurricanes of persecution are strewn the rocky coasts with the wreckage.

A Missionary Hero

To show the kind of heroic stuff out of which the Gospel fishermen are made, I would point you to the tragic history of the greatest missionary of the Fiji Islands, as he personally told it to me. Many years ago, the cannibals of those islands killed and ate the first missionary who had been sent there by the London Missionary Society. Immediately after that event, this missionary, then a young man, applied for appointment to the post of danger. He went forth with his young bride to what most of their friends thought was certain death. When the ship dropped anchor in the harbor of Suva, the native chief sent out word: "Give us another missionary, and we will make a meal out of him." In the face of that threat and of all these dangers, the young missionary and his bride disembarked. For ten long years they never saw the face of a white man, except when the missionary supply boat made its biennial visit. The young missionary's children were born there, in the woods. Two of his children died because he had no proper medicine. He lived there alone with his heroic wife until he transformed the whole island. Such is the career of one heroic Gospel fisherman. Are you and I ready to be as brave for Christ as were that noble missionary and his devoted wife? Are we ready to be inspired with that holy fearlessness and disregard of ourselves, that we may save souls for Christ wherever we can find them, which all Christ's fishers of men should show in his service?

The Net Full

The true Gospel fisherman must be spiritually a strong man. Peter and Andrew, to whom Christ spoke, were net fishermen. They were, in all probability, the kind of fishermen you perhaps have seen off the Massachusetts coast. There the fishermen fasten their net to stakes that have been driven into the ground, and the tops of which can be seen above the surface of the sea. They were physically strong men, else they could not have handled and set the nets. Or they may have been fishermen who watched the surface of the sea, just as the fishermen used to do along the Long Island coast. Then, as soon as the sea would be ruffled by the schools of swarming fish, the signal flag would be lifted, the fishermen would gather upon the beach, and the long-boat, filled with the piled-up net, would be launched. Then the fishermen on shore would hold a rope attached to one end of the net, and the boat would be rowed out around the school of fish. Then, when the whole net had been "paid out," the boat would approach the shore, the other end of the net attached by a rope to the stern. Then the men would begin to pull the ropes at either end of the net, dragging the fish nearer and nearer inshore, until at last they would capture the whole school. Yes, those fishermen had to be physically strong men. Their nerves had to be steady, their muscles firm, or they could never have dragged in those heavy nets, burdened with many fish.

The true Gospel fisherman must be spiritually as well as physically, a strong man. How could Charles G. Finney have been able to lead thousands and tens of thousands of immortal souls to Christ unless he had been spiritually a strong man. In his own strength as a Gospel fisherman, he could do nothing; but with Christ he could do all things. To show how absolutely Mr. Finney depended upon divine strength for the handling of the Gospel net, one of my old Pittsburg elders used to tell me of a remarkable scene he once witnessed in a New York theatre. Mr. Finney was preaching there, and the building was packed with people. After the noted evangelist had been speaking about ten minutes, he suddenly stopped and said, "Brethren, the Holy Spirit's influence is not here to-day. We must get the enforcement of the Divine power, else we are helpless. Let us pray." With that he knelt upon the stage; and he prayed until the audience was melted to tears. He prayed, and such was the reinforcement of divine strength at that meeting that the Gospel net gathered the sinners in by the score and by the hundreds, although during that entire service, Charles G. Finney did not preach another word.

The Christian believer must be spiritually inspired, if he is ever to become a successful fisher of men. My mother used to impress this thought upon me all my life, and especially did she try to do so after I had entered the Gospel ministry. There was hardly a letter which she sent to me after my ordination, that did not read like this: "My dear boy,—It is important for you to be mentally equipped for your church. But, remember, a true Gospel minister is essentially one who is inspired by the Holy Spirit. You cannot lead souls to Christ unless you yourself are divinely inspired. You cannot lead souls to Christ unless you have been much in communion with God; unless much upon your knees in prayer. You must plead at the Mercy Seat in your own home if you would plead aright for Christ in the pulpit." The mother cannot become a fisher of men and lead her children into spiritual lives unless she herself has experienced this divine inspiration. The Sunday School teacher cannot lead his class to the feet of Christ, unless he himself has first been baptized by the Holy Spirit. The minister cannot truly preach Christ, unless he has first taken Christ into his own heart and life. Peter and Andrew became Gospel fishermen because they themselves had first seen the Master's face and obeyed his voice, when he said, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men."

People have often asked me whether I believed in revivals of religion. Of course I do. Every one of the Protestant denominations has been started under the influence of a revival. But revival services can do harm as well as good. When a great number of sinners are brought to Christ through the influence of a revival, and then neglected—nobody looking after the converts, nobody caring for them, nobody trying to have them identified with a Sunday School class, a prayer meeting, a Christian Endeavor society, or Christian work of any kind—there is an awful lack somewhere. It is all-important to lead men to Christ, but it is also important not to let them backslide by neglecting them after they have once been brought to the feet of Jesus.

A few years ago, in Neuchatel, Switzerland, a number of Christian men and women got together for an interesting experiment. They meant to see what personal work among the criminal classes might do for the Master. The criminal records of that county showed that sixty-six per cent. of all criminals liberated from the penitentiary, usually returned to crime; and ultimately went back to the convict cells to serve out a second and a third term. So these Christian men and women put into practice this plain, simple plan. Whenever a criminal was incarcerated, some one of their number was detailed to look after that convict. In a sense he was the prisoner's guardian. This Gospel fisherman would visit the cell; he would pray with the prisoner; he would send him books and give him advice. And when that convict had served his term, this Christian guardian would find work and set him upon his feet. Did this Gospel plan work? The records of that county of Neuchatel proved that by this Gospel process the number of the returned convicts was decreased over fifty per cent. Instead of sixty-six per cent. of criminals being returned to the penitentiary for a second or a third term, there was only twelve per cent. So it is not only important for the Gospel fisherman to bring souls to Christ, but it is also important to have the new converts interested in and identified with Christian work. When an immortal soul is brought to the mercy-seat, the true work for the Gospel fisherman has just begun. If a sinner is allowed to confess Christ, and then, on account of the indifference of so-called Christian friends, allowed to drift back into sin, his last condition is worse than his first.

But the true Gospel fisherman is always working under the Master's eye, whether Christ's face is visible to him or no. After Peter and Andrew became Christ's fishermen, he never left them. One night, when these brethren, with John the Beloved, who was also a fisherman, and some of the other disciples, were tossing about on Lake Galilee, they thought they were going to be drowned. But Christ was watching their struggles, and in the fourth watch of the night, or just about five o'clock in the morning, Jesus was seen walking towards them, upon the waves of Lake Galilee. The true Gospel fisherman can feel that Christ is always ready to help him; that Christ will always come to his rescue, when the waters of trouble begin to roll too high, and the mists are settling too thickly around the Gospel life-boat.

Christ's care for his Gospel fishermen is a constant and tender care. In the Scotch fishing villages, the mothers and wives and daughters illustrate, by a beautiful custom which prevails among them, their care for their sons and husbands and brothers who have gone off to fish. When the fogs settle down upon the coast, and the lighthouses can no longer be seen, the women go out and sit upon the rocks. When the returning fishermen begin to approach the shores, and while yet unseen, they start a fishers' song. The loved ones waiting upon the rocks, listening until they hear the familiar notes wafted through the fog. Then the mothers, and wives and daughters and sweethearts also begin to sing, and the fishermen, hearing the voices of their loved ones, know which way to steer. So when the Gospel fishermen, in times of trouble, call to Christ, he always answers their call. And the Saviour's voice, sounding clear amid the voices of the loved ones who have gone beyond, will ultimately guide the Gospel fishermen from the troubled Sea of Life into the great harbor of Eternal Peace.

Are you and I willing to become Gospel fishermen? Are we ready to be one-purposed Christians, ready to be fearless, ready to be spiritually inspired, to become Christ's fishers of men? Are we ready to surrender ourselves, body, mind and soul, to the service of the Lord? When Doctor Nott, who for years labored among the South Sea Islanders, was one day asking a native to give his life up to the service of the Master, the missionary explained: "I can only afford to pay you fifteen shillings a month for your services." With that the native said, "Sir, I cannot afford to give up my time for fifteen shillings a month. But I can afford to give it up for Christ." Like the South Sea Islander, have you such love for Christ that you are ready to consecrate your life to the Master's service, regardless of remuneration, so that you may become one of his fishers of men?

PLANTING FRONTIER SUNDAY SCHOOLS

THE American Sunday School Union, in whose good work readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have long been interested, continues to enlarge its pious and benevolent activities. During the fiscal year closing March 1, 1902, the Union established 2,375 new schools, numbering 96,211 scholars and teachers. These have been put in operation in the most needy sections of our Territories, West and South, where churches were not in easy reach of the people. The Union has 120 permanent men engaged in missionary labor. There have been 8,327 hopeful conversions during the year as a result of their work.

REV. J. M. HARTLEY

They paid 180,005 visits to families needing such attention. Over 20,400 Bibles and Testaments have been distributed to them, besides good story books and Sunday School papers. His reading matter is sent into sections where the people have very little good literature, and is greatly appreciated. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is particularly valued. Through Rev. Edward P. Bancroft, Secretary of the Union at New York Headquarters, 156 Fifth Avenue, the following letter, showing how frontier Sunday Schools grow, reaches the readers of this paper:

DEAR FRIENDS:—Allow me to express my attitude for your recent gift to the American Sunday School Union, which amount was applied to the work on my field, at a small and difficult village where I have recently opened a Sunday School. The population is made up mostly of German, Spanish and Mexican people.

There are four saloons, but the nearest church service is held seven miles away. I have been making occasional visits there for a long time, before organizing the school. There being no suitable resident there to carry it on, I found a good man elsewhere, who was willing to devote his Sunday afternoons to teaching the children. The work has been growing from the first. We had the promise of but eighteen children, but twenty-nine came. Even the saloon-keepers are allowing their children to attend. Some of the Mexican and Spanish children come; but as a rule they are rather shy and difficult to reach, and their parents, having Roman Catholic prejudice, are not so ready to send them.

Back in the hills, ten miles from the nearest church, another community claimed our attention. The scattering families raise cattle, which roam over the brown uplands, and they do some dairying. Every year they have a great "round-up" of their cattle, separating the young and branding them. This always occurs on Sunday, and is witnessed by hundreds of people from many miles distant. Of course they needed a Sunday School there—most of them admitted that—but none of them were in "that line of business," they said, and so were not qualified to carry one on. At one time, an old minister used to come and hold a Bible service, but he died, and nothing of the kind had been conducted for eight or ten years.

After faithfully visiting all the homes in the adjacent neighborhood, I went to the nearest town, and there I spent over a day listening to people tell why they couldn't go so far to conduct a Sunday School, then tell who else could. At last we found the right man, a janitor at one of the school buildings. He was faithful, capable and godly. The following Sabbath we organized a Sunday School, with this man as superintendent. Others went out to assist in some special music, as a treat for the children. It was an interesting service. The children seemed "all eyes and mouths," as I talked to them of the story of Jesus. After the meeting one citizen mentioned this fact, and remarked, "You see this is the first exercise of this kind most of these children have been in since they wore long dresses." Faithful workers now go there every Sabbath. In the "Auld" community, back among the mountains, I recently had the pleasure of establishing a Sunday School, where there had been none for years. The people are badly scattered, and have lost so many crops by drought, that they are poor and disheartened. Three Spanish families send their children. This is very encouraging, for, as a rule, it is so hard to reach them. A recent letter says the Sunday School is doing all of them good. Since March 1 I have been able to plant eight new Sunday Schools, every one of them in needy places from five to ten miles from any church.

Training Cuba's Orphan Waifs

READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already somewhat familiar with the good work being done in Cuba for the little war orphans, by Mr. Elmer E. Hubbard and his devoted assistants. Mr. Hubbard went to Cuba just at the close of the war, while starvation was the usual thing and not the exception, taking with him what money he could raise from the sale of his own belongings. He rented a vacant house in Matanzas—empty and war-scarred—and put in a few empty boxes. With these and some boards and discarded tent cloth, he opened a Home for the stray little orphan children.

From that small beginning there have sprung up four Homes, which have been carried on entirely as a work of faith. Their history is full of interesting and convincing evidences that those who trust the Lord will be fully rewarded. At times, Mr. Hubbard has been compelled to earn money by the labor of his own hands to keep his Homes going; but never did his faith desert him.

Hearing of his heroic struggle, a business men's Bible Class in Detroit raised an emergency fund to tide the work over until other provision could be made for it. Then a young lady in the South, though an invalid, undertook to aid the work and has done much for it. The King's Daughters have also been good friends to the Cubanitos in time of adversity, and a society of little girls in Virginia, calling themselves "The Rosebuds," have undertaken to raise the rent of one of the houses sheltering the orphans.

In Cardenas, where the fourth Home has recently been opened by Mr. Hubbard at the request of the Mayor (who did not know how to provide for the homeless little children of the city), the Cubans themselves, notwithstanding their broken fortunes and devastated plantations, and the fact that they had already taken in all the children they could provide for, have given liberal aid and every encouragement to the work. It is hoped in time to make this Home self-supporting.

In Matanzas, the work is less securely established, and unless new friends are found for the children there, the little ones may have to be turned adrift. Miss Cunningham—the first one to respond to the call for teachers, and who is in charge of the Quinta Triolet Home at Matanzas—is a woman of unexampled devotion and self-sacrifice.

She tells of a little war that arose between the first and second Homes for boys. The minister of one of the Protestant churches made it possible for the boys of the second Home to have a little better food than their limited means had previously allowed. The boys of the second Home came over and boasted of this to the boys of the first Home, who finally became so exasperated that they fell upon the second boys, and concluded their administration of discipline by admonishing them never to say "fried potatoes and white bread" in their hearing again.

When the first President of the new Republic made a tour of the island, there was much excitement and a desire to do him proper honor. The boys of the Cardenas Home were given a place of honor in the procession, with nothing but the music and the war veterans in front of them. A young tree, used in the decorations, was given to the boys, and they planted their first school tree, calling it "Independence Day Tree." On the occasion of the President's visit, the little girls at the Matanzas Home had new white dresses, provided by Miss Cunningham, who taught for the money with which to buy the material, and then made the dresses with her own devoted hands. They were finished just as President Palma and General Betancourt arrived.

An example of the Cuban peculiarity of keeping a vow is seen in the case of a little boy in the Cardenas Home. When a little babe he was very ill, and his mother, who had taken great pride in having a son, prayed long and earnestly for his life to be spared, promising that if this were granted, she would dress him in girl's clothes until nine years of age—a strange vow, yet characteristic of the Cubans. He was brought to one of the Homes recently in his girl's dress, with his long hair worn in braids. When it was suggested that he have boy's clothes, he protested that it would not be right to disregard his mother's vow, and that for two years longer he must be a girl. They call him the "Promisa Boy."

At this crucial time, when Cuba is passing from a dependency to a free government, there are naturally many difficulties, and these Homes are having a hard struggle for existence. It would be a great pity for so good a work as that of Mr. Hubbard to fail for lack of support. Any of our readers who would like further particulars of the work may write, or if already desirous of giving aid, may send remittances to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. All contributions will be acknowledged.

TO REDEEM THE PHILIPPINES! ☼

WITHIN the last few days, Governor Taft—the United States' special representative at Rome, who is conducting the negotiations with the Vatican for the removal of the Catholic friars from the Philippines—has received his final instructions. These are doubtless in the form of an ultimatum. Indeed, before this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches its readers, the date of the removal of the friars may be a settled thing if the exodus has not actually begun. Their removal will leave all religious denominations in the Philippines on a footing of absolute equality. The field will be everywhere open for the preaching of the free Gospel of Jesus Christ. Till now, the work of Protestant evangelization has been conducted under great difficulties and in the face of much opposition; but all that will be presently changed. It will be the hour of Christian America's opportunity to bring the Filipino multitudes into the Gospel fold.

From letters that have been published in these pages from time to time, our readers have already become somewhat familiar with the Gospel work that is now being done in the Philippines by the pioneer missionaries, who have carried the standard of Christ to the front in that distant land. Miss Emma R. Ross, of Manila, writes under recent date:

The Methodist and Presbyterian societies are doing a fine work. They each have a large and rapidly increasing following. They are now at work upon the translation of the Bible into Tagalog, and other dialects of the islands. Because the Spaniards did not allow the natives to read the Bible, this work will be gracious to us, and we hope the American people will help the Filipinos, as they are doing now, to progress and prosperity in these days of toleration.

Among the Protestant denominations now represented in the islands are the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal and others.

One of the most notable workers is Rev. Nicolas Zamora, a native convert, and now a most successful preacher to his countrymen. Mr. Zamora writes us as follows:

MANILA, May 26.

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—Enclosed please find an outline report of my work. I thank you heartily for kindly sending me $10. This I expended by investing $5 in catechisms and hymn books in the Tagalog language. I further gave $2 to Lino Villanueva, who goes to Navotas, across the river from Malabon, to preach "without price," as he is poor.

THE REV. NICOLAS ZAMORA
"The Apostle to the Filipinos"

I paid his traveling by boat to San Roque, a suburb of Navotas, where he opened up a meeting. I subscribed the remaining $3 in the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to a church building for Malabon, which the people are erecting.

Each of these meetings has a distinct history full of interest, from the first opening of the door to the crowds, drawn by curiosity. It is a surprise to many that we no longer fear Rome. This tyrannical politico-religious combination killed all who differed in opinion from them. (My own father was deported in 1896 to the Island of Chafarines, near Spain, for no other crime than possessing a Bible.) The Americans opened the door of religious freedom that allowed his return.

A godly merchant named Arthur W. Prautch, who came from America, opened the first Protestant services in Manila in 1899. He invited me to speak in his meeting and at once appointed me in charge. He directed my studies, and on March 10, 1900, when Bishop Thoburn came to Manila the second time, I was ordained deacon in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Prautch also started the first preaching among American soldiers and organized an American Methodist Church. During the last nine months of 1899, I held 147 public services, besides taking part in union meetings, pastoral visiting, funerals, weddings, etc., and the work is increasing.

The intolerance of Rome is broken, the true light shines in a dark place, and I feel honored at being permitted to open the eyes of my fellow Filipinos, who were kept in ignorance by deceit and the withholding of the Word of God. "The seed is the Word" (Luke 8: 11).

Again thanking you for taking an interest in the work, I beg to remain affectionately yours, NICHOLAS ZAMORA.

Accompanying Pastor Zamora's letter is a statement of the work, which includes Gospel stations at Paruaque, Malibay, Santa Cruz, Baucusay, Gagalaugin, Aguila, Camba, Paudacau, Pescadores, Santa Meza, Malabon, Hagonoy. At these places 147 meetings were held, with an average weekly attendance of 2,100.

When it is remembered that this remarkable showing is the work of one consecrated native convert, and that all of these people were nominal Catholics a little over a year ago, it is wonderful indeed. The people are clamorous for the Gospel. They need more workers. The field could accommodate hundreds of earnest missionaries. Will not the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD aid us in equipping a band of workers, who, like Zamora, shall make the redemption of the Philippines the object of their lives? The field is ready; the men are ready. If any reader writes to have a share in this soul-saving and race-redeeming work, such co-operation will be welcomed. All letters addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the subject will be promptly answered, and contributions in aid of the work will be acknowledged.

ALARM at the prevalence of trusts, appears to be general in Europe. It has taken definite form in a proposal emanating from the Russian Government for an international conference. The suggestion is that the various governments should take into consideration all the agencies and combinations formed to artificially affect the price of commodities. The proximate cause of Russia's action, is said to be that the recent conference on the sugar trade took cognizance of certain indirect bounties paid by that government for the development of its sugar industry, and suggested retaliatory measures; but the Czar appears to think that the opportunity is favorable for considering, in connection with Government trade legislation, the operation of the trusts, which, in his opinion, are much more dangerous. Similar alarm appears to exist in England, for Mr. Whitelaw Reid, in a recent speech at Liverpool, took special pains to allay it, by dealing with the subject of the Morgan shipping combination. Mr. Reid assured his hearers that the combination would tend to prevent violent fluctuations in rates. Whether his assurance will have the effect he intended, is doubtful. British merchants are evidently apprehensive and do not relish the prospect of this huge trust. They may be disposed to look favorably, therefore, on the Russian suggestion of an international conference on the general subject. It is difficult to see how the Powers can prevent the organization of trusts, if the merchants are to preserve the liberty of action that has hitherto been deemed indispensable to the development of international commerce. The suggestion, however, is significant, as an indication of a growing recognition of a common interest among the nations and a disposition to unite in resistance to a common peril.

The Striking Miners

NO labor movement in recent years has affected so many industries or made itself felt so generally throughout the country, as the strike now prevailing among the coal miners in the anthracite region. A staff representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has visited the strike centres in the coal region, talked with the miners and lived among them. Our next issue will contain the first of a series of illustrated articles, describing with realistic fidelity, the life of the miners in their homes. It is a picture full of pathos and teeming with suggestion.

These articles, as they appear, should be read widely, as they present, with absolute fairness to both sides in this great controversy, the actual condition of affairs in the mining districts at the present time. So little is known concerning the real life of the miner or of his surroundings, that these letters will be welcomed as a valuable and timely contribution to the history of the most extensive strike the new century has yet witnessed.

True Dignity

ANYBODY may rise—true dignity consists in coming down gracefully. It was a great coming down for Peter, after the death of the Master, having held for several years the position of leadership of the disciples, to return to the rude fishing boat and the slimy nets, and the hard toil of catching fish for a living. But he went back to his trade quietly and nobly.

Every four years we hear a good deal of silly talk as to how we can add to the dignity of a retiring President, who returns from the White House to his old home. Even a seat in the Senate of the United States seems to be ruled out for an ex-president, as not befitting his dignity. Only one in the whole line from Washington down has ever been asked or, at any rate, consented to take such a seat, and go on serving his country in a lower place than the highest. All honor to the memory of John Quincy Adams, whose Congressional career became, indeed, his chief title to glory. Nothing can add to the graceful humility which a public man may show, who, having filled a more conspicuous trust, resumes the ordinary path of life, to be useful in any way for which he is fitted by experience and ability.

The rule ought to work in every sphere of life. If a man has been a preacher and a pastor, and his work in that exalted position has come to an end, by ill health, or of growing age, or any other circumstances, he is not degraded, he is ennobled, by the spirit that leads him to lay his hand to any honest toil among his fellow-men.

Are there higher and lower places in the church? If a man has been pastor, or deacon, or trustee, or Sunday School superintendent, why should not he be willing afterwards to come and take his place among his fellow members as teacher in the school, or helper in the mission, or usher, or doorkeeper—anything, anywhere, to serve the Lord and help his dear cause? But he is willing if he is Christlike.

Evangelize the Philippines!

IN deciding upon the removal of the four orders of Friars from the Philippines, our Government has kept steadily in view these essential points, viz:

1. It is the universal wish of the population of these islands, Catholics included, that the friars should be withdrawn.
2. The people themselves, in many instances, have already seized the friars' lands and are openly hostile to their return.
3. One of the avowed objects of the insurrection was the confiscation, without remuneration, of those lands.
4. The friars are not now, and for many years have not been, performing their religious functions among the people, which should have been their chief claim to support and recognition.

But while it is fully decided that the friars shall withdraw, our Government desires to act with absolute fairness. Their lands are to be purchased and honorably paid for. Should this proposition be rejected, the property can be taken by condemnation and paid for at a proper appraisement. Such is the situation in a nutshell.

It has been made clear to the Vatican, that the people themselves are resolved to be rid of the friars. This feeling is shared by all classes, high and low, clerical and lay, parish priests included. Their withdrawal can in no sense be viewed as discriminating against Rome, as it is demanded by the Catholics themselves. They have been an incubus and a stumbling-block to the progress of the islands for generations and now their day has come. Their own people have decreed their expulsion.

That accomplished, the field will be open for the evangelization of the Philippines. Already our Government has sent nearly a thousand teachers to impart general knowledge to the population. Now, let the Christians of America take up the crusade of spiritual enlightenment, and send out a phalanx of missionaries to teach them the Way of Life. As a people, they know not God. They are ripe for evangelization. They are clamoring for the Bible and for Bible teaching. Read the letter from Pastor Zamora, the converted Filipino, which we print on another page, and see how, even under the teaching of one consecrated worker, converts and congregations are springing up everywhere.

We invite every reader of this journal to aid us in this crusade for souls. Let us occupy the field. Let us equip and place, side by side with Nicolas Zamora, a hundred native Christian workers, who shall go out into the highways and byways, teach the people and enroll them under the banner of Jesus. It is a glorious opportunity. Reader, are you ready to grasp it, and to help win some poor, brown-skinned, benighted Filipino to Christ.

PROBABLY the largest number of guests ever entertained at the same time by one man, sat down to dine in London on July 5. King Edward had invited the poor of the city to a feast, and he was determined that his illness should not be the cause of disappointing them. The nobles and wealthy people had to forego their celebrations, but the King insisted that his poor guests should have the feast he had promised them. While so much criticism of his character has been circulated, this sympathetic act should be set down to his credit.

The basis on which the invitations were at first issued, was that of income, but it was afterward modified, and was in the end so elastic that all of the poorer working-people received invitations. It is estimated that more than half a million persons sat down at the King's tables, and some of the newspapers say that they numbered fully a million. There were four hundred centres at which they gathered. Some were large halls and others were tents in the parks. The largest was at Stepney, where about 40,000 sat down. At Fulham there were 14,000. The menu was beef, mutton, pudding, tarts and fruit. To each guest was given an earthenware cup inscribed with the date, and the words: "Presented by His Majesty." The provisions included 350,000 pounds of meat, 250,000 pounds of potatoes, 250,000 loaves of bread, a million ounces of cheese, 125 tons of pudding, besides beer, ginger beer and lime juice.

At each gathering, a letter was read from the King's Secretary, saying: "His Majesty and the Queen had intended visiting some of his coronation dinners to-day, and he deeply regrets that his illness prevents their doing so. The King has deputed members of his family to represent him at as many of these dinners as possible. I am further commanded by the King to express his hope that his guests are enjoying themselves and passing a happy day." The Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the royal family went to many of the centres and were most enthusiastically cheered.

The Suffering in the West

RECENT telegrams in the daily newspapers, stated that owing to successive droughts in Texas, thousands of people in Zapata County and other sections were suffering from lack of food. Simultaneously, dispatches from points in Kansas and Nebraska stated that the farmers were greatly in need of help to reap the harvest, and that 5,000 men would be immediately engaged at good wages, if they could be had. The Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD promptly telegraphed to the Governor of Texas, tendering assistance, if desired, in relieving the suffering in Zapata County. He also sent messages to the Governors of Kansas and Nebraska, offering to send a thousand men to help reap the crops, if the situation were as represented. Governor Savage, of Nebraska, replied that the local labor supply would be adequate for the harvest in that State. Governor Sayers, of Texas, replied as follows: "I am advised that the people of Zapata County have a sufficiency of supplies to last them until September 1, next. Should this information, however, be untrue, the people of Texas are abundantly able and willing to furnish the necessary assistance. The indications at present are that we will make an average cotton crop in this State. If so, lucrative employment will be given everyone who may desire to work. Thanking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very much indeed for the interest heretofore and now taken in this State, I am," etc.

Governor Sayers' prompt assurance that Texas is able and willing to attend to the needs of the Zapata County drought sufferers, will relieve the general anxiety felt in their behalf. It is gratifying to learn from the Executive of that State that the prospect in Texas is a very hopeful one, industrially and agriculturally.

A Delighted Sunday School Teacher

Editor Christian Herald:—I received from my Sunday School class a Red-Letter Bible as a present. I am delighted with it. It excels anything I ever saw in the Bible line. It is so interesting to know just when you are reading the Saviour's own words. I wish to express my thanks to you. Also the class sends thanks and many good wishes. I will tell you what a wide-awake class they are.

Through their efforts the Colony Union Sunday School was organized. The average attendance during the past year has been fifty-four. In a new colony, in an out-of-the-way place among the mountains of California, I think this is very good. To their number of "Merry Workers" they have added eleven workers' new names, making twenty-three in the class at present. At Christmas they presented their teacher with the beautiful Red-Letter Bible, sent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a schoolmate who had left for high-school, and the Art Portfolio they gave to twelve children. So you see for the small sum of $3 sunshine was sent to fourteen lives. A pair of invalid slippers made a poor woman happy. China, too, was remembered, with three hundred Sunday School cards.

Fall of Venice's Historic Tower

DEEP grief fills the hearts of the people of Venice. Their beautiful bell-tower, part of the Cathedral of St. Mark, has fallen, and is now a heap of ruins. It was three hundred and twenty-two feet high, a most graceful structure, visible a long way out at sea. A crack had been observed extending diagonally across the tower several weeks ago. On July 13, the rift had widened considerably and masons were engaged to make repairs. The tower was closed to the public and people were prevented walking across the plaza at its base. Before the masons could get to work on July 14, the condition of the tower became increasingly dangerous. It was seen to vibrate menacingly, and about ten o'clock the upper part fell, and the lower part, opening gradually, sank into a heap of ruins, bells, marble, and woodwork in one confused mass. It is believed that no one was killed under it, but several passers-by were hurt by the flying debris. The tower has stood for eight hundred years. Its erection was begun in 888 and was completed about 1100. The builders dug through the strata of clay and sand on which Venice stands, and at a depth of sixteen feet drove in piles of white poplar ten inches in diameter. Horizontally, on the top of these, heavy oak beams were laid, making a level platform. Upon this platform were laid the granite blocks that formed the base of the tower. Various causes are assigned for the collapse of the historic edifice. It is certain that the bricks of the interior had decayed; but the most serious injury, as well as the most ominous for the other parts of the city, is due to a shifting of the strata of sand which lie under the whole city. One of the most eminent architects in Venice, gives the opinion that many other ancient edifices are in danger. He says that the piles on which they are built are now unsupported by the earth, and are rapidly decaying. It is a remarkable fact that Signor Vendrasco, an architect who examined the Campanile twelve years ago, reported it to be in a dangerous condition. The government sent an officer to investigate, and he having reported it safe, Vendrasco was officially reprimanded. Ten years ago he gave another warning, and early in June this year, for the third time, he cautioned the government. His persistence seems to have irritated the authorities and they cashiered him. The event, however, has vindicated him, and they now doubtless regret that they did not heed his warnings, and protect the tower when it might have been done safely. They were like those ancient people, described in Scripture, who resented the warnings of the prophets instead of heeding them and averting disaster by amending their lives:

Who say to the prophets, Prophecy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things, prophesy deceits (Isa. 30: 10).

A Tramp's Inheritance

Among the tramps who applied to the Sheriff of Mincola, L. I., for a night's lodging last week, was a deplorable-looking object that excited the pity of that official. The man said he had been tramping for three years, getting work when he could, but owing to ill-health was seldom able to do such work as was offered. He had come from the far West and was on his way to the home of his sister in Ohio. He thought that if he could reach her she would find him a shelter and medical attention until he was able to do regular work. The Sheriff took compassion on him and found him a night's lodging. The next day, however, the tramp was too ill to be moved and was sent to a hospital. It was then deemed wise to communicate with the sister of whom he had spoken. She replied promptly, saying that she had been searching for her brother for more than a year and was very glad that he had been found. An uncle in Germany had died, leaving a large sum of money to be divided between them, and he had been wanted to take his share. The news was communicated to the tramp and operated to his speedy recovery. He was sent on by train to Ohio to enter his claim for the inheritance. If the man had communicated with his sister before, how much suffering he would have been saved. Probably he would not have done so even then, had he not collapsed, but his extremity resulted in his deliverance. So it often is in spiritual matters. Many a man owes the greatest blessing that could ever come to him, to some dire affliction which drove him to the God, whom in his prosperity he neglected.

Before I was afflicted I went astray: but now have I kept thy word (Ps. 119: 67).

A Conductor's Negligence

The widow of a conductor on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad has lost a large sum of money by the decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York. Her husband was killed in a rear-end collision while sitting at his desk in the caboose of the train. The lower court gave her substantial damages for the loss she sustained by her husband's death. The higher court, however, said that while the heirs of an ordinary passenger might be entitled to damages if he had been killed, the heirs of this particular conductor had no valid claim. It was his duty when his train was stalled to send a flagman back along the track to stop any trains that might be coming on the same line of rails. He omitted to do so, and in consequence the next train, being unwarned, dashed into the train in which the conductor was sitting and killed him. No one else was killed. The court held that his death was due to his own failure to observe the held back by the police and compelled to remain on the Island all night. It was an annoyance, but only a temporary one, which soon passed away. Infinitely more disastrous is the case of many who postpone to the last their return to God, thinking that in their last illness there will be opportunity for salvation. They are never, as in the case of the passengers, refused because there is no room for them, but very often because pain or unconsciousness prevents their making application.

Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation (II. Cor. 6: 2).

Scared by Liberty

The throng of people about the Grand Central Station in New York were amused a few days ago at the curious conduct of a person who had just arrived by one of the trains. He peered cautiously from a door, and with a terrified look turned back into the waiting-room. There he shrank into a corner trembling from head to foot. Presently he gained courage and again ventured to the door, but again retreated. After several more attempts he finally stepped to the sidewalk. Slinking close to the buildings, apparently afraid of the contact of any person, he reached Third avenue. He walked in the roadway as if there he would be more alone than on the sidewalk. Finally he reached his destination, a restaurant, where an old friend welcomed him and took him into an inner room. It was learned that he was a prisoner from Sing Sing, who had been pardoned by Governor Odell after being more than twenty years in prison. He had been convicted of murder and his sentence commuted to imprisonment for life; but after serving for twenty years, he was pardoned. When the good news reached him in his cell, he fainted. Afterwards, he shrank from going out of the prison and actually remained three days, before he could summon courage to leave his retreat and enter the busy world again after his long absence. His friend says that he asked to have the door of his bed-room locked on the outside at night, otherwise he could not sleep. He thinks it will require a month or two to accustom him to liberty. Probably, when he was first incarcerated, there was no blessing he craved so much as liberty. Now, for a time, though he has it, he cannot enjoy it. So much do the habits of life change our nature. This is a suggestive fact, for there are many who hope to enter heaven when they die, who are habitually living in sin, and so depriving themselves of the capacity of enjoying heaven, even if they were to be admitted there.

Let favor be shown to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness; in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly (Isa. 26: 10).

THE CAMPANILE OF ST. MARK'S, VENICE, WHICH FELL JULY 14

rules of the company, and his heirs were, therefore, not entitled to compensation. Thus, the conductor's negligence not only cost him his life, but prevented his family getting the compensation for his death that would have been paid to the heirs of any other man who might have been killed. Still more serious are the consequences of negligence in the things of the soul. How many there are who have lost the salvation put within their reach, not so much by absolute wickedness as by neglecting to accept God's offer.

Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it (Heb. 4: 1).

Stranded Passengers

Nearly three hundred excursionists were driven almost frantic a few days ago by the operation of the law. They had gone to Coney Island from New Jersey towns on various boats during the day. About nine hundred in all had made the excursion. If all had returned on the boats that took them there, no difficulty would have occurred. The attractions of the island, however, were engrossing, and as their tickets permitted them to return on any of the boats belonging to the company, they all waited for the last boat. The result was that nine hundred persons were congregated on the iron pier when the last boat swung alongside. The laws of New York as to the loading of steamers are much more stringent than those of New Jersey, and the authorities insisted that only six hundred passengers should go on the boat. Protests, entreaties, arguments were used, but all alike failed, and three hundred persons were

SUMMER SCHOOLS AND CONFERENCES

By Margaret E. Sangster

AMONG the most enjoyable privileges the summer affords are opportunities to attend summer schools. Teachers who feel the need of some stimulation, or of more extended knowledge in a special line, often combine vacation with study. At Chautauqua, or Bay View, or Cornell University, or Winona Lake, or some other pleasant spot, they make a stay of several weeks, listening to lectures, renewing old habits of application, fitting themselves for more advanced classes, while, also, they have chances for much outdoor recreation, for rowing, sailing, riding, or mountain-climbing. We are always broadened and benefited by contact with our fellows, and one who has spent a year in the classroom, necessarily looking down at one's juniors, is much improved by sitting on an equal plane with one's peers, and by looking up with reverent eyes to one's intellectual superiors.

Summer Conferences, where Bible study and spiritual progress are the main objects in view, are of lasting and fortunate influence in the development of many a rare character. A young woman goes to a great Christian Endeavor Convention, or to a Christian Association Conference, and spends some consecutive hours of a week or ten days in hearing consecrated men, in prayer, in praise. She receives inspiration. Her sympathies are quickened. She is a better worker, a profounder Christian, and a happier disciple for the outing and the occasion.

When we attend Conferences, we are sometimes entertained as guests by kind friends to whom we are strangers. Should this be the case, we must try to make no trouble for our hostess that we can possibly avoid; we must conform to her household rules, and in every way open to us show our gratitude for her courtesy. Above all, when we leave her and are again at home, we must not omit the personal letter of politeness which sends our thanks in writing, and we must not be chary of expressing these sentiments in generous phrases.

Let Some Things Go

The heat was registered among the nineties, but Blanche Wilbur could not omit a single detail of her Saturday house-keeping. Her cousin Ruth came in to call, looking cool and fresh in a white lawn dress, a fan in her hand, and her face as smoothly unlined as if she had been twenty, yet Cousin Ruth was fifty odd.

"Blanche! Blanche!" she exclaimed, "you are not using the carpet-sweeper to-day, I hope."

"Is that you, Cousin Ruth? Sit over here in this clean spot. I always go over the whole house every Friday, irrespective of weather."

"No wonder you look fagged out. Do you maintain the same unvarying round the whole year—washing, baking, ironing, cooking, hot dinners, in July as you do in December?"

"Why, certainly. I may not be a genius, but I do try to be a perfect housekeeper. I wish I had more strength. I do get so fearfully tired."

"Your education was neglected, Blanche. A perfect housekeeper should know how and when to let things go. Some things can be slighted. Some can be postponed. A

HOME THOUGHTS ON THE PORCH

By Margaret E. Sangster

About Being Late at Meals

FEW men understand why it is that their women-folk are so upset when the man-of-the house is late for meals. Considerate husbands there are indeed, who are exceedingly punctual, and whose non-arrival on time would cause uneasiness in the family; but the majority of the male sex, while expecting a meal to be ready on the instant if they want it, are very ready to suffer business or pleasure to detain them fifteen minutes or a half hour, especially at noon or evening.

The wife has planned her dinner or supper with great care. Very likely she has prepared with her own hands dishes which her good man likes. Eaten when cooked these favorite viands are delicious, but when put back in the oven and kept hot, or when broken to serve some members of the family who cannot wait, they cease to be in perfect order, and cease to be a treat. I have known a man to linger over his garden or his celery or asparagus bed, ten fifteen and even thirty minutes, while his wife, with a meal prepared, could not go on in comfort with any of her proceedings, and saw her whole day's work blocked because he would not stop until he was quite through with his task. Of course, if there are circumstances which make such a course on the man's part imperative, his wife is happy to be inconvenienced, and is very amiable in accepting his excuses. Nine times out of ten there is no excuse offered, for the excellent reason that the man could have come in had he chosen to do so. Equally, the merchant or the professional man who is not particular about leaving his office that he may make his usual train, who lingers needlessly over his work or chats to some employee or client, adds a burden to his wife's day. He throws the machinery out of gear. In housekeeping, as in other business lines, it is most important that the day's work should run without friction, and that every department should fit smoothly into every other. One habitually tardy person disturbs the ease of every other person under the roof. Happy-go-lucky house-keeping is never comfortable. Though it seem to be easy, it is difficult, and it is akin to all other unbusinesslike performances, in doing injustice to somebody. When I hear boys and girls pleading to be allowed to finish what they are doing before coming to the family table, I always feel like urging their parents to deny them. The loiterer should be sharply held to exactness, for as the youth does in the home of a too indulgent mother, will the man do, at the expense of his home peace in later years.

This talk would be incomplete without a reminder to the wife who is derelict in her own sphere, who is herself apt to be a wee bit late, who tries the temper of her household by unpunctuality. If only the laggards of either sex would secure a little earlier start, there would never be any trouble about lateness anywhere. A half hour's earlier beginning would remedy every difficulty and substitute plenty of time for the haste that makes waste, and the hurry that means worry.

FAITHFUL COMRADES

Little Donald is well guarded by Leo, the big dog, and Sparkle and Fancy, the little ones. Comrades and friends they are, and Donald should share his feast with them and not be selfish.

perfect home-maker is far more to be honored than a house-keeper who so wears herself out in looking after the setting, that she is too weary to be the soul of the home."

"You may be right," sighed the tired Blanche.

Alice in Wonderland

"Gain yesterday," said the White Queen, "and gain tomorrow, but never gain to-day." Some of us have had just this tantalizing experience. The past mocks, and the future evades. But the strong hand may compel the present to yield up its gifts.

ROYALTY ENTERTAINS TWENTY-FIVE HUNDRED ORPHANS

ALTHOUGH nearly all the celebrations arranged for the Coronation of King Edward VII. were necessarily postponed, on account of the King's illness, there was one pleasing event which was carried out as arranged. The Prince and Princess of Wales had invited twenty-five hundred orphan children, from various London institutions, to lunch, and to view the royal procession from the gardens of Marlborough House, on June 26th and 27th. Although the latter part of the programme was rendered impossible, the Prince and Princess determined that the little ones should not be altogether deprived of the treat to which they had been so eagerly looking forward. They therefore announced that the children would lunch at Marlborough House, although there would be no royal procession to view, and the gardens of the princely mansion were filled on both days with hundreds of poor but happy children, who roamed about the beautiful lawns, enjoying the sunshine of royal hospitality.

It was a memorable occasion, not only to the orphans but to all who witnessed their pleasure. There were about 1,200 children present on the first day, which was to have witnessed the royal coronation. The various contingents began to arrive at about half-past eleven in the forenoon. First came 450 boys and girls of the London Orphan Asylum, and as they marched through the great gates into the garden—their bright faces all aglow in anticipation—they presented a very striking picture. The girls, dressed in brown, kept step prettily to the strains of the orphanage band. Next in the procession came one hundred and fifty inmates of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, headed by pipers playing a lively tune. These were followed by 200 children from the Police Orphanage at Strawberry Hill, and 50 little ones from the Soldiers' Daughters' Home. Eighty prettily-dressed children from the Deaf and Dumb school next took up their places, expressing in mute, pathetic, fashion their delight, and then 300 little ones from the Merchant Seamen's School, at Wanstead, swung through the gates to the strains of "God Bless the Prince of Wales!" In this last contingent the girls wore navy blue dresses with sailor collars and hats, and the boys were in blue serge, with peaked caps.

As each body of children marched to its allotted position, it passed before a cinematograph, a desire having been expressed by the royal hosts that a permanent record should be obtained of so unique a gathering. Most of the little ones were a little frightened by the whirring noise.

Before sitting down at the tables for lunch, the orphans were made free of the beautiful lawn and the shady elms. They romped over the stand from which they were to have seen the royal procession, and looked curiously at a neat little summer house, in which were three bicycles and half a dozen horses on wheels,—playthings belonging to little Prince Edward, heir to the British throne, and to his brothers and sister. Pretty pictures were made as the children, dressed in their school uniforms of red, white, blue and maroon, moved in changing masses of color over the green lawn, or sat in serried rows at the long tables under the tent and trees.

Music was supplied by the boys of the Foundlings' Home, who did wonders with the "British Grenadiers" during the long march past the cinematograph, and color was furnished by girls of the Soldiers' Daughters' School, who were there in vivid scarlet dresses. Before lunch was served, the girls from the Patriotic Fund Orphanage, in pink and blue, joined hands in three circles and sang a pretty little song in childish trebles and altos, with the universal refrain, "God save the King." It was a pathetic incident, as at the time these children were enjoying their holiday, King Edward was hovering between life and death in his sick chamber at Buckingham Palace, not far away.

For the midday meal the tables were spread with plates of lamb and mint sauce, crisp, green lettuce, fresh rolls, piles of oranges, and rather formidable slices of cold plum-pudding, and with jugs of ginger beer to wash it all down. Each school, as it finished the meal, rose and sang its own "Grace"—the foundlings lifting their closed eyes and placing their hands together in a most charming manner, while their band played a plaintive and ancient air.

Soon after lunch, all were formed up in phalanx again, the garden gates swung open, and the Prince and Princess of Wales drove in. Small Prince Edward and Prince Albert drove in the same carriage, their sister, Princess Victoria, in a pink muslin frock, sitting demurely between them. The little orphans cheered the Prince and Princess of Wales lustily, and then they all marched past the royal pair, each division headed by its band playing the "British Grenadiers." The Prince and Princess showed undisguised pleasure at the pretty spectacle afforded by the moving mass of bright faces. After the march past, the Prince and Princess dismounted and moved among their winsome little guests, with evident enjoyment. The Prince of Wales had just come from his father's sick-room, and it seemed to cheer him to be among so many happy children.

The whole scene reminded me of similar celebrations I had witnessed at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD HOME at Mont-Lawn, when kind friends had visited the children there.

OUR MAIL-BAG ?

THE QUESTION OF THE WEEK

In cases where there is a strike, is a Christian workingman justified in offering his services to the employers, if he knows that by so doing he will help to defeat the strikers in securing just remuneration?

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

II. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date on which they are intended to appear.

III. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

IV. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

V. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of the MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VI. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper.

VII. Letters addressed to the MAIL-BAG must contain the names and addresses of the writers, not for publication, but in order that answers may be sent by mail when that mode is preferable.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions suitable for discussion in this department.

SPECIAL NOTICE

In future, only one question will be submitted each week, in order that a larger space may be devoted to a full discussion of that question. We publish herewith a list of questions to be answered on the respective dates.

He Has No Moral Justification

If a strike is in progress to obtain a just remuneration for work done, no Christian, nor any one else who has the welfare of his fellow-man at heart, has any moral right to offer to take the place of such strikers, or to assist in any way to defeat the ends desired by the striking laborers. "Verily, the laborer is worthy of his hire," and to help deprive him of any of it, is not in accord with the teachings of the Great Master; but tends toward lowering the quantity of bread earned by the "sweat of the brow." WM. W. CASE.

The Christian Can be Neutral

In such a case, a Christian workingman will do nothing directly or indirectly to oppose them in their attempt. Certainly he would not accept employment, however great his own need, in the place of one of them. This is the exact meaning of the Golden Rule. If the equity of the strike is somewhat doubtful, the Christian will at once see the propriety of remaining strictly neutral. This principle forbids him from taking the place vacated by the striker. If the strike is ill advised, unreasonable and not founded in justice, the Christian man may, without violating any Christian principle, improve the opportunity for bettering his condition. J. G. OSBORNE.

Act by the Golden Rule

The Golden Rule teaches us to "do unto others as we would have others do unto us." Now, if the Christian workingman knows that by offering his services in the place of the striker, and thereby assists in defeating the striker his fellow-brother in securing his just remuneration, how can he be justified in doing such an un-Christian act?

C. J. WESTERBERG.

The Other Side of the Case

Any man is justified in taking the position formerly held by a man who is now on strike, for as soon as a man goes out on strike he surrenders his position. The clerks and bosses who have taken the places of the striking firemen and pumpmen in the anthracite coal region are not only "standing by" their employer, but are doing the striking miner a favor as well. If the mine pumps were not kept running, it would take from three to five months to pump the water out of the mines that would accumulate during the strike. But now work can be resumed as soon as a settlement is made.

CHARLES H. WOLFE.

A Coal Miner's View

Speaking from the standpoint of the coal miner, no laborer, if he is a Christian, or at heart a man, will take the place of his fellow laborer, "if he knows that by so doing he will help to defeat the strikers in securing just remuneration."

J. EDW. WOLFE, JR.

Extreme Necessity Would Justify Him

Nothing but extreme personal necessity would justify him in disregarding the struggle of a fellow-man for his rights. Extreme necessity would be ground for him to make personal sacrifices. The same would justify him in temporarily disregarding the needs of another in his struggle. Nothing short of such extreme conditions should justify a man in the disregard of the efforts of others to secure their dues. This is based on the supposition that the strike is right and lawful, with a just claim.

C. P. ATKINSON.

It Would be Selfish and Traitorous

If he believed the strike to be unprovoked or ill-advised, he might lawfully do so; if he were driven into submission by the necessities of those dependent upon him, he might be held excusable; but if the object of the strike were the "just remuneration" of the workers, he would assuredly be guilty of selfishness and treachery, if he accepted a vacant position, merely to secure gain for himself, with no thought of the welfare or advancement of his class. In general, the average workingman will probably act more nobly, if, being a member of a union, he stands by his party, than if he breaks off from them to secure his own advantage.

KATHARINE PEARSON WOODS.

A Clear Moral Duty

If the man feels assured that the strike is a just and expedient one, his course is clear; he ought not to offer his services which, so far as their effect would go, would be defeating the ends of justice. He has a moral duty also to perform, in giving the weight of his influence to a right cause.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

Must Make Sacrifice for Principle

If he can get other work, or can get on without work while the strike lasts, he is certainly not justified in taking the strikers' place; since by so doing he would "help to defeat the strikers in obtaining just remuneration." Even if he could not get other work and those dependent on him should suffer, he would not, strictly speaking, be justified in taking the place of the strikers, because his circumstances would be no worse than those of the strikers themselves. He would have the same chance of a livelihood as they while the strike lasted.

M. L. GOSS.

Considers he would be Justified

Yes, he is justified in getting honest, honorable work wherever and whenever he can. In the first place he must ask: "Is this strike right? And why are we on strike?" The answer may be: "We strike because we think the weigh boss is not giving us correct weight. The operator won't change the boss, and if we quit, our places will soon be supplied, and we are left without work." So they are all called out in order that no one may get the work which they won't have. If the miner could only realize that he is an individual, and not one of a lump, and go as an individual to the operator, and frankly state the case, he would be dealt with as man to man. As the quarrel is not his own, he is justified in getting his daily bread by the first honest opportunity that opens to him. MRS. L. W. NUTTALL.

Would be Contrary to the Gospel Spirit

Some men, who fail to keep up with the progress of the past half century, are of the opinion that if employees get sufficient wages to supply the necessities of life, they should be content. Such ideas do not belong to an intelligent and progressive people. When trade is brisk, the market values of property, merchandise and provisions increase, and rent and the cost of living are higher; consequently the employee needs an increase of remuneration for the maintenance of himself and family. When times are prosperous, the capitalist's profits are increasing, and it is only fair that the employees should have a share. Any professing Christian offering his services when the strike is justifiable, thus hindering or defeating the righteous cause of his poor brethren, is doing an injustice and acting contrary to the spirit of the Gospel. Such a Christian should place himself in the position of an employee to realize his privations and difficulties, and the expense of bringing up his family to fit them intelligently for the duties of life.

S. F. ELLIOTTE.

A Woman's View of the Case

There may be—there usually is—a difference of opinion even among the employed as to what constitutes just remuneration. The Christian workman knows this; he may have no sympathy with the strikers. He knows that many people, in no way connected with the employees or the employer, are suffering because their supply of some necessity or means of livelihood is cut off. He, an honest man, is willing and able to support his family on his employers' terms. He needs the job, and no one will support him in idleness. May he not take what the other man will not have, however the other man may regard his cause? Most certainly he may. It is not only his right, but his Christian duty to grasp the opportunity.

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. G. D. V., Cardwell, Va. What Scripture forbids or disapproves of gambling? Give some moral reasons for not gambling. Is there any difference between betting on horse racing and gambling?

There are many things which, though not specifically condemned by Scripture, are generally conceded to be among the things to be avoided. In this category we would place every form of gambling, and this conclusion is justified if we properly interpret those Scriptures that denounce envy, covetousness, love of money, the wrongful getting of riches (Jer. 17: 11) etc. The playing at dice or other games of chance has always been discountenanced by the Christian Church. Clement, Apollonius, Justinian, Jerome, and several of the earlier general councils of the Church took positive ground against the evil, and in later times it has been denounced by every Christian denomination in the world, in turn. It has led countless multitudes to ruin. Betting on horses is just as much gambling as betting on cards.

Recently a reader of this paper wrote asking to be informed regarding the personal wealth of General Booth, founder of the Salvation Army. We referred the letter to the Army headquarters in New York, and Consul Emma Booth-Tucker, a daughter of the General, and the wife of Commander Booth-Tucker, replies:

General William Booth has no personal wealth. He has had, for some twenty years gone by, a small income, which has enabled him to bring up his family and meet his personal requirements, apart from the funds of the Salvation Army, but beyond this, he neither has nor desires anything. He occupies a small cottage in the suburbs of London, where, together with his secretaries and a Salvationist housekeeper, he lives about as abstemiously and modestly as is possible.

C. F. N., New Lexington, O. How is coal loaded from colliers into ocean steamers while at sea?

Chaplain H. W. Jones has kindly answered the above as follows: "Ocean steamers, or 'liners' do not coal at sea. The largest of them have coal capacity of from three to five thousand tons, and will burn from three to five hundred tons per day. Coaling ship at sea has been experimented with, but with very little success. All navies of the world are anxious to perfect a coaling device. The only successful operation, so far, is for the collier to come right alongside the man-of-war, and the coal is then hoisted on board. There is another plan nearing perfection, which is, for the collier and ship to continue headway, and then, by means of a long trolley, the coal is taken from one to the other."

Inquirer. In his book on The Small End of Great Problems, Rev. Brooke Herford, the well-known English divine, gives an interesting account of the derivation of many terms employed in the religious life of our own times. "Pontiff" comes from "Pontifex," the Roman title for the pagan priest. White surplices were employed in the temples of Egypt. A strange line of derivatives is the Vedic "Dyaus-Pithar" (Heaven-Father), the Greek "Zeus Pater," the Roman "Jupiter"—all preparing the way for the Christian title of "Heavenly Father." "Easter" is a survival of the old Saxon festival to the spring goddess "Eostre." All-Hallows Eve fires are the ancient "Beltein" or fires of Baal, transformed to Christian uses. Christmas presents are a survival of the gift-giving during the Roman Saturnalia.

All the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

H. P. M., Hartford, Conn. When did the Christian Church adopt the practice of punishing heretics, or, in other words, how early in its history did the Church assume the role of persecutor?

The idea that the State has a right to punish deviation from the established religion is of pagan, not Christian origin. Whenever Church or State has assumed this, pagan precedent, not Christ's example and command, has been followed. As early as the time of Constantine (274-337 A.D.), the first Roman Emperor professing Christianity, civil penalties were inflicted for religious offences. Just as his predecessors had punished Christians for differing with them, so Constantine was ready to punish Christians for differing with one another. Constantine was always a half-pagan, and the reality of his conversion to the Christian faith has ever been a matter of doubt to historians. In his own conduct, he combined many pagan and Christian usages. When Theodosius made the Nicene Creed the law of the land, the punishment of any deviation from it was a natural consequence. Pope Innocent III (1161-1216), created the Inquisition. He held any departure from the established faith a crime against society, Church and State, demanding inquiry and punishment.

W. G. S., Grange, Md. Enclosed find clipping from an English paper (The Andover, Hampshire, Advertiser), which, if true, deserves to be published. The clipping describes the morals of Martinique and says:

The people in Martinique are a very wicked crowd. The Kennel (reel-ship) arrived at Fort-au-France on Sunday afternoon. They found the town all excited. Some election was going on. Bands of music were playing in the streets. The theatre was open ready for the play in the evening; a masked ball was to be held. The Acting Governor asked first who was to pay the freight, and even wanted the gentlemen to pay duty for the things they were giving them. They said, "Yes, St. Pierre is gone," and were perfectly indifferent. "It seems ridiculous," they added, "sending one cent to Martinique. What for?" The people are all dead. "On Good Friday the mob killed a pig, hung it upon a cross, with a crown upon its head, representing our Saviour, then buried it; they dug it up on Easter Sunday, and dressed it as a priest, making a mockery of his death and resurrection, and yet on His Ascension Day they were called to their account." Sodom and Gomorrah must have been similar to Martinique.

Charges of godlessness and immorality have been made in many quarters against the people of Martinique, and especially the people of St. Pierre. If these are facts, the truth should be known, as a warning to other cities.

Obviously no date can be assigned to this event. Indeed, beyond what is given in his "Confession," almost all the history on the subject is legendary and traditional.

J. H. S., Lincoln, Neb., writes, concerning a notable instance of the liquidation of a church debt. The First Presbyterian Church of Lincoln, for fifteen years had a bonded debt of $8,447. The pastor, ladies and trustees lately united in an effort to raise the money, and succeeded. Besides doing this, the Church gave over $1,000 to foreign missions. In all, $14,000 was paid in during the year for church purposes.

Any good encyclopedia will give you approximately the loss of human life by wars, volcanoes, earthquakes, etc., but it should be remembered that such records are necessarily incomplete. If the fabled sinking of Atlantis, with forty millions of souls, be true, and if the various cataclysms which science indicates as having occurred at remote periods of the world's history be accepted as true, the sacrifice of life from such causes must have been incalculable.

Driving Drink from the Church *

NADAB AND ABIHU
A TEMPERANCE LESSON

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR AUG. 10
LEVITICUS 10: 1-11

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- 1. THESS. 5: 6:
"LET US WATCH AND BE SOBER."

"BLESSED art thou among men," was doubtless said by many of Aaron, for he was not only a minister of God himself, but had four sons associated with him in the ministry. Aaron was himself the High Priest, and his sons were his assistant priests. Aaron wore beautiful robes, that were called "the golden clothes," and his sons were dressed in pure white linen—emblematic of purity. But two of these sons were drunkards. Let us follow as they reel into the Tabernacle. They enter the holy place, the larger of the two rooms in the Tabernacle. They are carrying something with them. One has a censer filled with frankincense and other spices. The other has coals of fire in a metal vessel. It is the hour of evening prayer, and they are supposed to put on the golden altar, both the spices and the fire, as a sign that they are God's helpers. They are laughing at their own smartness in getting "strange fire," so called because they did not take it from the great altar in the court of the Tabernacle. That was fire sent from heaven on the day when the Tabernacle was dedicated, and there was a command that fire for the golden altar should be always taken from that holy fire. It was sacrilege—a worse profanity than swearing—to carry any other fire into God's house. A look of coarse daring is in their faces. They reel up to the golden altar, and then they say: "Let us not stop here, but let us go beyond the veil into the Holy of holies, and let us burn the incense on the mercy-seat, instead of the golden altar." Neither of them had ever been in that room before, for it was God's law that only the High Priest should enter there, and he might go in only once a year, on the great Day of Atonement. If Nadab and Abihu had not been drunk, they would not have ventured in. God's presence was in that room, and his brightness shone on the mercy-seat. Nadab and Abihu, with their drunken hands, placed the strange fire and the incense on the mercy-seat. There was a flash of great light which struck Nadab and Abihu, and they fell dead. Two dead men in the Holy of holies! Such a sight was never seen before! No one knew what had happened, for Nadab and Abihu only had gone in. But when they did not come out, their father went in to see what had become of them. With a look of terror on his face, we see the High Priest coming out to tell Moses what has happened. Aaron can make no excuse for his sons, so he has nothing to say. The people are overcome with terror, and it is so quiet, that in every part of the camp may be heard the voice of Moses, as he tells two men, who were in a way cousins to Nadab and Abihu, to go in and bring out the dead bodies and bury them. Aaron and his other two sons keep out of sight while this is being done, for so Moses had commanded. They are not allowed to attend the funeral, lest it should seem that they were honoring the two men who had so dishonored God. Moses had said to them: "If you come out of the door of the Tabernacle to see the dead men carried out, you shall die also."

Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die.

This was the law God gave to Moses for all who should be priests or ministers in his house. And Moses told it to Aaron and his two sons; and to every priest who came after them, the same law was given.

And what of the sadness of Aaron, and the brothers of the dead men? They could not eat their food, even a part of the sacrifice which was their portion. To eat such meat, was like eating at God's own table. At first, Moses was angry with them for not eating, but when they explained that they did not think God would wish them to eat, Moses was content. And so sin and the sorrow it brings ever separate men from God. Shakespeare has said: "How sharper than a serpent's tooth to have a thankless child." He might have said, to have a drunken son.

Illustration and Application

Our lesson story tells the beginning of the long warfare, not yet ended, to drive drink from the Church. When that is done, it is quite possible to drive it from the world, for drunkenness, as the Mohammedan says, is "a Christian sin," that is, this vice is mostly found in so-called "Christian lands," and others to which Christian nations have sent it. Christian citizens are the most influential people in their own countries, commercially, socially and politically, and could compel these countries to suppress the drink curse. If we could get drink out of the Church, we might join with the other great religions, whose one virtue is abstinence, in a world-wide war of extermination against the drinking usages. The supreme reform is to enlist the Church in reform. In order to do that, we must get the enemy all on the outside. In this lesson we read of God's very first battle with drink in the Church, and it was a deadly one for the drunken young priests who that day fell beneath God's thunderbolts of wrath.

The Bible does not say that Nadab and Abihu were drunk when they went skylarking through the Tabernacle, breaking the rules God had made to teach his people reverence and obedience; but the fact that immediately after the tragedy the rule was given to Aaron, "Do not drink wine or strong drink, thou nor thy sons with thee, when thou goest into the Tabernacle, lest ye die," is sufficient proof that they were drunk. And such sacrilege is in accord with the history of drink ever since (Isa. 28: 7). Drink and profanity are ever boon companions. Not alone the sacred Name but the sacred Day, is constantly profaned by those who have to do with drink. And we must also include in the sacred vessels that drink desecrates, the sacred marriage tie. Every elecountry, making inquiries as to certain marks of identification, that each might know if it was, or was not, his boy who had come to such an untimely end.

But the great lesson to be learned to-day is that drink has no business inside the Church. I do not mean the "meeting house" only, but the Church built of living stones, all dedicated to God's service. Let no Church think it enough to condemn drunkenness. The liquor dealers did that much in their last national convention.

Let us not put more into our Bible lesson for to-day than belongs there. The virtue of temperance had not yet been fully revealed. We must look into later portions of the Bible for laws of total abstinence. Words could not more plainly condemn our license system than the curse Isaiah pronounces against those who "justify the wicked for a reward" (Isa. 5: 23). And Habakkuk's "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink" (Hab. 2: 15) forbids not only liquor selling but treating, and that, too, whether the treating be done in a saloon, or at a social reception, or a public dinner. And total abstinence could hardly be expressed more strongly than in the command, "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red" (Prov. 23: 31). Thousands of churches have rallied about these Bible standards of total abstinence. The churches most advanced in temperance not only exclude liquor dealers from membership, but require ministers and members alike to abstain. This is the position of all Methodist churches in the United States. But Methodists in Great Britain, in General Conference assembled, only last year refused to declare that liquor dealers should not be church officers, and abstinence is not yet required even of their preachers, though an increasing majority of them voluntarily practice it. Churches are in different stages of progress, but all are marching toward universal abstinence. In all Churches, ministerial drinking, especially universal a century ago despite the plain implications of the command to Aaron and his priesthood, is giving place to total abstinence, and this lesson may well hasten that forward movement.

A wine glass in a pulpit is "strange fire" indeed! A British Methodist preacher, the author of a book on spiritual fire, preaching in a pulpit where the writer of these lines in previous years had often proclaimed the Christian duty of abstinence, placed a wine glass beside the pulpit, believing the lying promise of the "mockery" that it would give him strength and inspiration. The people saw with surprise and indignation the "strange fire" and cared not a whit for the sermon whose message that dash of red had killed, as one picture sometimes kills another in an art gallery. A Scotch Presbyterian preacher, serving a prominent American church, said at a Burns' banquet that a Scotchman was the only man that could carry his Bible and bottle together and not get them mixed; but he got his mixed, and went from that pulpit to an inebriate asylum. Both these preachers are now happily exceptional cases, whereas a hundred years ago neither incident would have prompted special remark.

But even this lesson, by fair implication, goes beyond abstinence for preachers on duty. If wine is unbecoming in the pulpit, so is it also in the parsonage. If a minister's brain should not be fuddled when he preaches his sermon, no more should it be when he prepares it. And what a layman sees to be un-Christian in a preacher must be so in every Christian.

Nor should our temperance teaching stop with what the Bible says on the subject. God is still speaking to us in the Newest Testament of history, and by the new translations science is giving of the Oldest Testament of Nature. The liquors that hastened the deaths of Nadab and Abihu are furnishing fresh tragedies in our own day, that teach us that drink works mischief not only in the Church but in the State, not only in the home but in the world of business. Andrew Carnegie, addressing a railroad Y. M. C. A., said: "A drinking man should have no place in a railway system; indeed, he should have no place anywhere." He also said then, or at some other time, "Glasses are used over and under the nose. I always use mine over." Surely men who truly see, by the glasses of science and experience, the nature and effects of drink, will no longer admit an enemy into their mouths to steal away not alone their brains but their souls. Certainly nothing is more brainless than asking men at all hours to "take a drink."

"Tops," a female elephant of the Forepaugh & Sells circus, killed a trainer recently. He went to the elephant's enclosure, where the animals were waiting for their breakfast, and each stuck out his trunk to "shake hands" as the trainer passed down in front of them, it being the custom of the trainers to salute each elephant with a gentle pat. The trainer had a beer glass in his hand, and when he approached "Tops" he shoved it at her instead of giving the usual greeting. This act seemed to offend the great beast. In an instant she seized the man with her trunk, and after hurling him violently to the ground, knelt on him and crushed him to death. Keepers came to the rescue too late. They drove "Tops" back and removed the body.

If men could realize the misery offered them in the name of friendship when the social glass is proffered, they would resist it not with mortal attack, but with moral refusal.

"THERE WENT OUT FIRE FROM THE LORD AND DEVoured THEM"

ment of home life the traffic curses. Nadab and Abihu might as well have stabbed their father and mother as bring into their home that trilogy of sorrow and shame and death, that drink has since so often repeated, even in Christian homes. To be doubly bereaved so suddenly was a heavy grief; but to have their sons die in drunken sacrilege, that was heart-breaking indeed, and every drinker takes the risk of bringing such shame to his loved ones.

The horrible fruit of liquor was revealed in the juvenile court of Chicago, when a probation officer presented to the judge a four-year-old boy who was a confirmed drunkard. The father and mother of the child are separated. The mother had placed her baby in the care of a friend, who betrayed her trust and taught the child to drink, because he acted so funny when drunk. It was stated that the child had acquired such an appetite for liquor that he calls for it as soon as he awakes from sleep, and cannot get enough. It is even a worse case when a father has taught his own child to drink, by his example or otherwise.

Some time ago the body of a young man was found in the River Mersey, near Liverpool. In his vest pocket was a piece of paper on which was written, "Ask not my name. Let me rot. It is drink which brought me here." The coroner was so touched with the tragedy that he published a description of the unfortunate youth, and his farewell message to the world. At the end of three days he had received three hundred letters from as many parents all over the

THE DRUM-MAJOR

HOW THE LITTLE DRUM-MAJOR WENT TO MONT-LAWN

"Oh, but didn't we have a good time!" said the little Drum-Major, when making a gratitude call at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, in company with tall "Captain Johnnie," leader of the Abigail Fife and Drum Corps. Other visitors were present, and, stimulated by their interest and his Commander's encouragement, this doughty officer related the story of the Corps' outing to Mont-Lawn.

"We went by the Bible House in a truck," he said, "and weren't we playing! Dr. Klopsch waved his handkerchief to us out of the window. He knows us—our Corps's been to Mont-Lawn every summer for three years." "Yes," says Captain Johnnie, "and we want to help the Home now all we can. Of course, we go up and play for the march and for the little girls from the Gospel Settlement to make their 'Patriotic Pole.' Weren't their red, white and blue streamers pretty?"

"Our Band had the barn to sleep in—we had it all to ourselves. We got up at five every morning and made ourselves neat, and got in line and marched to the tent for breakfast. We stood around the table and said grace, and then we sat down. And then we eat—a lot! We went swimming in the Hudson, and then we marched back to dinner, and we always had good appetites. We played ball, and we played bean game. We went to chapel, too; and we liked the singing and the prayers and the talks."

"Dr. Klopsch was there on the Fourth, and a heap of people; and Dr. Klopsch came to where we were and thanked us for the music, like we were grown-up musicians. He came to the Home to see us and the children often, and every time we saw his carriage coming up the hill the children cheered, and we blew the trumpets and played the cornet and beat the drum. He was awful good to us. I am going to be a bandmaster when I grow up, and I'm going to have a drum corps and a brass band, and I'm going to the Home and make the biggest fuss ever was."

Band and then we try to make them better. We play for a great many Sunday School parades, and we do a lot of church work."

Captain Johnnie is tall and stalwart; so are others of the Band, and the tiny Drum-major walking in front twirling his stick, looks too cute for anything. "I made him Drum-major," says Johnnie, "because he understands the business; he knows all the beats—when to put his stick up or down or sideways—and the band keeps time to his motions."

The little Gospel Settlement girls, who "made the Patriotic Pole," divided honors with the Band in entertaining visitors and guests. These small maids have received much care and loving training at the Settlement, and Mother Bird always sends them we're asked." "Sure," says the wee Drum-major. "I was a kid when I went last year. The Captain on the Chrystenah and all the deck-hands knew us when we marched on board. The passengers came around us, and we played and we played as we sailed up the river. We marched off the boat at Nyack playing, and we played through the village, and we played nearly all the way to the Home; and when we saw the House on the Hill—oh, didn't we beat our drums and blow our trumpets!"

"You see," says Captain Johnnie, "our boys think a lot of the Home—it's like home to them. The fresh air and the good food and kind treatment have been a great help to them; most of them are very poor. Thirty-one members of our Band, ages ranging from six to seventeen, went up on that trip. And besides ourselves, the Home was entertaining a lot of very poor children from our Mission." "Well, what did you like best, Charlie?"

"The country," said Charlie emphatically. "We went swimming in the river every day. And we went into the woods and got wild flowers. And we picked pond lilies off Rockland Lake, and we gave them to the kind teachers. Once, we caught a snake. We liked to play in the brook, and we tried to catch bull frogs; and we saw mud turtles. When we came away I brought my mamma some apples."

"It was fine on the Fourth of July. We had ice cream and fireworks. We played like everything for the children to

THE PATRIOTIC POLE ON THE MEADOW

Captain Johnnie is proud of his band. "Most of our boys are Christians," he said. "If a boy isn't a Christian when he joins the Band, we do all we can to make him one. Our Band helps the missionary work at the Abigail School; our music attracts the children to the place. We get boys into our health and strength—and perhaps life itself—to many a little one. It may mean, too, a turning-point in moral character; for children are brought under Christian influence at Mont-Lawn. Cash should be sent to this paper; garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N.Y.

MORE LAMPS IN THE OLD LIGHTHOUSE

FROM many States responses have come to the appeal for an extension of the work of the old Bowery Mission. Since the formation of the Lighthouse League, several months ago, many branch leagues or circles have been organized, and these are now working on similar lines to those followed by the parent Lighthouse League of the Bowery Mission.

The letters received from the members of branch Lighthouse Leagues or circles, show the widespread desire among humble Christian people in all parts of the country, to become actively, yet unostentatiously, identified with the Master's work. We give extracts from a few of these communications:

Mrs. M. A. Y., Mendon, Mich., writes: I thank you for the card of membership. I am willing to try to form a circle in Mendon. My heart is in the work of soul-saving. Please send me full instruction as to methods and work.

Mr. P. S., Eugene, Ore., writes: Just received my card of membership in the Lighthouse League, for which receive my thanks. In regard to members of the church of which I am a member, you can send me a dozen application blanks, or you can send the blanks to them direct, as you think best. Wish the League abundant success.

Mrs. E. M. R., Talladega, Ala., writes: Am glad to be a member of the Lighthouse League, and will continue, I hope, till my life-work is done. Am interested in all missions. I pray God's blessing on this grand and noble work.

Mrs. M. L. N., Burbank, O., writes: As I like to do something more for the dear Lord, will you please supply me with necessary information, that I may form Lighthouse Leagues in towns and cities. . . . I can lecture in public, and I am willing to go wherever I can do some good.

Mr. I. M., Frankstown, Pa., says: I will try, by God's help, to help the work along. I have been contributing one dollar a year to the Bowery Mission for at least five or six years, and will do the same for the League.

Mrs. M. A. L., Boulder, Colo., writes: I shall be very glad to organize a circle here in Boulder. It is a work in which I am intensely interested. Please send me five application blanks.

Mrs. T. W. L., Jamaica, L. I., writes: I am more than willing to organize a circle if I could. Think the Bowery Mission work one of the greatest, grandest Christian works of the day. Would be very glad to help a little.

Mrs. E. S. H., Enfield, Mass., says: I was much gratified to receive a card of membership of the Lighthouse League. I feel a deep interest in the saving work of the Bowery Mission, and for some time have been praying daily that it may have the prayers of God's people and be abundantly blessed with means to carry on the great work.

Mrs. T. P. B., Colorado Springs, Col., writes: I would like one half dozen or more of the circulars and cards. I have four Christian women that have joined, and know of quite a number of my friends that will join. . . . I pray that God will help me in this work.

Mrs. H. E. B., Plattsburgh, N. Y., writes: Received card of membership this morning to the Lighthouse League, and thank you for the honor. My heart always responds to the work of helping sin-sick souls to a knowledge of a Saviour's love and sacrifice for them.

Cards and all necessary information will be supplied to any one who may write to O. B. Booth, General Secretary, 92 Bible House, New York.

"THE LORD'S TENTH"

A READER of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who desires to remain unknown, has sent us the following letter:

"To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

"DEAR SIR:—Please find enclosed, draft for $221.00. The Lord has recently blessed me with a sum of money I was not at all expecting, and this draft represents the greater part of his tenth. I wish $21.00 to be used for the support of a cot for the season at your Children's Home, and the remainder I would like to have used in foreign missionary work. You will know the needs of the work much better than I can, so I leave it to your judgment to use it where it will do the most good. It gives me the greatest pleasure to be able to do this much for the Master, and I am sure he will add his blessing.

Very sincerely your friend,

IN HIS NAME."

In accordance with the wish expressed in the foregoing letter, the donor's generous gift has been apportioned in the foreign missionary field as follows:

Drafts for the above amounts were sent to all the parties named as beneficiaries in the foregoing list, on the same day the remittance was received.

Artificiality in Worship

No Power can be Accepted as a Substitute for the Holy Spirit

MRS. M. BAXTER

GOD never deals with us according to what we are in our sinful selves, but according to what we are in Him who represents us at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high, where the blood of Christ "speaketh for us" (Heb. 8: 1; 12: 25). Aaron would have been slain for making the golden calf, but for Moses' prayer and Moses' offering (Deut. 9: 20), for Moses was the type of Christ as the Mediator. He it was who must put on Aaron the holy garments; Aaron must not himself put them on. Moses must place the breastplate upon him, set the mitre on his head, and pour the anointing oil upon him. He must bring, slay, and offer the sin offering and the burnt offering; but Aaron must put his hands upon them to identify himself with them (Lev. 8).

Thus the whole congregation must know that Aaron confessed and repudiated his great sin, and they must know that because he was forgiven and restored, they also might have pardon and restoration. They saw the consecration of Aaron; his ear, his hand, his foot, set apart for God by the blood of the ram; and they saw him keeping the charge of the Lord by abiding seven days at the door of the Tabernacle (Lev. 8: 21-24; 33-36). But on the eighth day, the resurrection day, Aaron might himself offer a sin offering and a burnt offering, because he was accepted through the offerings which Moses had offered; and then the Lord would appear (Lev. 9: 1-4). And now the congregation might draw near and stand before the Lord, because Moses had first drawn near (ver. 5). But still something was wanting that the glory of the Lord might appear. Aaron, now fully reconciled, fully accepted, must bring the sin offering for himself and take the place of the forgiven sinner, and then he might offer for the people.

So he who had built an altar to the golden calf, now drew near to the brazen altar, and made atonement for himself and for the people. And Aaron was so free from his sad past that he "lifted up his hands toward the people and blessed them." This could not have been if the burden of his sin had been still upon him. But now that he had been blest as he never had been before, he could enter with Moses into the Tabernacle, and "they came out and blessed the people: And the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people. And there came forth fire from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt offering and the fat" (ver. 24). This was fire from heaven, rays from the shekinah glory; a manifest proof that God in person accepted the offering. And that divine fire upon the altar was to be "kept burning" "all night unto the morning" "it shall not go out."

God's acceptance of man is not proved by any emotion or excitement in our hearts, but by the manifestation of God to our souls by the Holy Spirit. He may, and often does, stir up our emotions, but it is not the emotion, but the cause of it, the manifestation of God, which is the fire from heaven. Fire consumes; and the drawing near of God to us does not fill us with excitement, but with holy awe; it does not fill us with self-confidence, but with strong confidence in our God. The fire reduces the living sacrifice (Romans 2: 1) to ashes, but the heavenly fire is nourished by the fuel, and in measure, as we disappear, the fire itself is strengthened: the fuel disappears, the fire grows. This is the secret of our true spiritual life. Every self-renunciation at the call of God's fuel for the fire of God; all self-confidence, self-interest, self-consciousness, self-mingling, dulleth and damps the fire, and communion with God is hindered by it. When the priests were prepared, God would appear; when his people are ready, Christ will come again. All creation waits for "the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8: 19). "When all the people saw it, they shouted, and fell on their faces." God deals quickly with the people when his priests are prepared. But where God appears, there Satan is always ready to work.

... WE'VE BEEN PRAYING FOR YOU ...

THE hour for the service was passing away. The leader was pleading, that, ere he should pray,

Each would seek for a friend, and invite him to come To the altar of mercy, while yet there was room.

A father sat waiting, he could not tell why, When his child came to seek him with love in his eye.

"Won't you come, papa, please!" he whispered, "Oh, do! All day while at work, we've been praying for you."

The father felt deeply how great was his need. The Spirit, resisted, continued to plead.

Forty years he had walked in the pathway of sin, It was time with his child a new life to begin.

He came to the altar and made the glad choice, And others soon followed while Christians rejoiced.

We shall find by and by when the books shall be read, Many souls into heaven the children have led.

Oh gather them early, call into the fold The dear lambs of the flock for the Shepherd to hold;

The parents will follow—what else can they do, When the little ones whisper, "We're praying for you!"

PIONEER WORK IN NEW MEXICO

This interesting reminiscence of the first Protestant service ever held in New Mexico, is furnished in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from a subscriber, Mr. John McCoy, of Independence, Mo. He writes:

Looking over recently the minutes of the Presbyterian General Assembly of the year 1901. I found the church in Santa Fe, New Mexico. W. H. Moore, pastor, had a membership of 93 and Sunday School of 150 scholars, and in the Spanish church 20, while in Albuquerque a much larger number, and in the whole of New Mexico 1,773 members and 121 elders. Seeing this, my memory carried me back to other days. In the spring of 1848, my brother and others, with myself, transported across the Western plains a large number of wagons filled with merchandise intended for the markets of Santa Fe and Chihuahua. The management and sale of this large stock of goods was entrusted to me. Early in May of that year we started across the plains, and after sundry mishaps and adventures, we finally reached Santa Fe in safety in the latter part of July. Previous to the entry of the train, a few of us had gone forward to engage rooms for our trappings and for our employees and ourselves. It was quite a pleasant and homelike place. Many of our employees were members or attendants of some church at home, and were gratified to learn that we intended to hold religious services in our rooms, thus expressing our thankfulness to God for a safe arrival at this point of our journey. Some citizens of the town joined with us in the meeting. Our harness and wagon boxes answered for chairs, and thus seated, we listened to the reading of the Scriptures and united in earnest prayer, praise and thanksgiving that we had been so signally blessed and protected at all points from roving bands of Indians and other vicious characters on the prairies. These religious services were held within a stone's throw of one of the oldest Catholic churches in New Mexico. This was the first assemblage of Protestant Christians ever held in any part of Old or New Mexico, and from this little rivulet has flown out a stream of Christian usefulness, which will continue to spread until the whole of that benighted and priest-ridden country shall become a God-loving and a God-fearing people.

OUR NATIONAL DISEASE

Caused by Coffee.

Physicians know that drugs will not correct the evils caused by coffee, and the only remedy is to stop drinking it.

Dr. W. J. Allison, of Heber, Ark., says: "I have been a coffee drinker for fifty years and have often thought that I could not live without it, but after many years of suffering with our national malady, dyspepsia, I attributed it to the drinking of coffee, and after some thought, determined to use Postum Food Coffee for my morning drink. I saw that Postum was made carefully with directions, and found it just suited my taste. At first, I used it only for breakfast, but I found myself getting so much better, that I used it at all meals, and I am pleased to say that it has entirely cured me of indigestion. I gained 19 pounds in 4 months and my general health is greatly improved."

I must tell you of a young lady in Illinois. She had been in ill health for many years, the vital forces low, with but little pain. I wrote her of the good that Postum did me and advised her to try it. At the end of the year, she wrote me that Postum had entirely cured her, and that she had gained 40 pounds in weight and felt like herself again."

Chap. XXXVII.—A Scrap of Paper

BE careful that thou merit not the ill-will of even a dog," runs an ancient aphorism; a nugget of truth, which is further incorporated into endless myths and legends. We have all heard the legend of the maid who spoke gently to the old witch-woman, and afterwards found pearls and diamonds drop from her mouth, and of the poor lad who rescued the fish, the bird and the fly, and married the beautiful princess in a blaze of glory. When dull humanity shall finally learn its lesson, it will discover that rude, passionate and unkind words are like the boomerang. It will then begin to comprehend the mysterious underlying law of love—which, indeed, is the greatest law in this world and in all worlds.

Mrs. Snider went away from the presence of her erstwhile friend and crony filled with rage and mortification. "She's a nasty, stuck-up thing; that's what she is!" she cried wrathfully. "I'll never speak to her again as long as I live!"

Mr. Snider was deeply displeased at the turn affairs had taken. He had not at first blush approved of his bride's plan of visiting Newport. He clumsily reminded her of this fact.

"Don't you say 'I told you so,' to me, Jack Snider," retorted the lady with spirit. "You were mighty soft on Hil yourself once, and you said we might stay two weeks."

Mr. Snider pursed up his lips in prudent silence.

"I guess if I should tell that big, soft husband of hers, a thing or two that I know, he'd cut her off a little on her pin-money," continued Mrs. Snider.

Mr. Snider lifted his black eyebrows inquiringly.

"You see that Rossi fellow made out he was poor when he was courting Hil up in the country. She didn't have anything else to take up her time, so she let him make love to her; but when she got home, I could see she had two minds to throw him over. She didn't want anybody to know she was engaged, and made me promise—cross my heart—I wouldn't tell."

Mr. Snider's round face assumed a deeper shade of purplish red as he stared at his wife's angry countenance. "Say!" he ejaculated, "did you tell me she was engaged to be married to that fellow when she come home from her gran' father's?"

"Of course she was. She didn't know a word about his money, either. I thought I should die the day I found that paper."

"What paper?"

"Why, ain't you got a lot of curiosity, Jack!" Mrs. Snider glanced up into the frowning eyes of her husband with a mixture of coquetry and suspicion on her lean face. "What d'you want to know for?"

"Just fer fun," dissembled Mr. Snider, biting his cherished mustache.

"'Twas funny, sure!" agreed the lady.

"I found a paper wrapped 'round a crock of butter; in it was this." She paused to extricate from her traveling bag a scrap of folded newspaper. "I meant to give it to Hil sometime while we was there; I thought she'd show it to him, an' we'd all have lots of fun over it."

"It's about him, ain't it?"

"Yes; an' she was struck all in a heap when she read it. I thought she was going to faint away. Up she jumps and lights over the door as if she was crazy."

"Where'd she go?"

"Why, down to the post-office to be sure; Cal Winters told me the very next day. She wanted to get two letters out the mail."

"Did he give 'em to her?"

"No, he told her he wouldn't. But I'll bet she got 'em somehow or other. She always used to get her way in the end."

Mr. Snider was slow but sure in his mental processes. He recalled having come upon Job Winters just as that young person was extracting a mail-bag from under a big elder bush at the road-side. The youth's stammering explanations and entreaties had left a distinct impression on his mind. "Say," he burst out, "was it about the middle of August she done that?"

"Why, yes, it was; it was the seventeenth. I remember, because you proposed to me the very next night. I was so surprised; I thought you liked her best, Jack!" The bride squeezed the manly arm linked within her own, and rolled up her greenish orbs sentimentally.

Mr. Snider's reply was so inappropriate and unexpected that the lady was shocked. "Jack," she said, severely, "do you realize that you said wicked words? And you a member in good and regular stand—"

"I don't care if I did!" snorted the young man. "The little minx! I'd like to—"

His bride stared at him in silent amazement for some minutes. Then a curious mingling of satisfaction and wrath swept across her face. "I understand the whole thing now," she said, composedly. "You proposed to her, an' she threw him over an' accepted you. When she read that paper she changed her mind."

"Little cat!" growled Mr. Snider.

"I'm not pretty, like Hilda," pursued the lady, with astonishing calmness; "but—but—I've always loved you, Jack!"

Mr. Snider read truth in the face that was upturned to him; all at once it appeared beautiful to him. "Melia," he said earnestly, "I'm glad she done it! Mebbe I'd been so fooled by her I'd never had my eyes peeled to see you."

It is a pity that Mrs. Snider could not have rested satisfied with the entirely satisfactory outcome of this little comedy of errors; love truly is sweet; but the fatal scrap of newspaper suggested revenge, and revenge is also sweet.

On a bright summer morning, some two weeks later, as Immanuel Rossi stooped to look at his little son, who was being wheeled about in his perambulator on the lawn, a servant handed him a letter. He thrust it carelessly into his pocket, and continued his attentions to the lordly occupant of the fairy vehicle, which foamed over with costly laces and embroideries. The youngster had gotten to the point of fixing laughing eyes of recognition upon his father, the while he babbled charmingly in the unknown tongue of babyhood. The white-capped nurse looked on with an indulgent smile for awhile, then, quick to observe tokens of approaching petulance in her charge, announced with authority, "that it was time for Master Armitage to be taking his forty winks of sleep."

The discreet father, yielding to the superior wisdom, withdrew to his library. There were papers here to be inspected, and a host of letters to be written. The pile of sealed and addressed envelopes suggested the unread missive of the morning. He opened it deliberately; a scrap of newspaper fell out. He glanced it over with some amusement. "Remarkable Caprices of a Multi-millionaire!" Who could have sent him this absurd account of himself? Why did papers print such inanities? He asked himself these questions while his fingers further explored the envelope.

There was a folded paper within; his eyes seized quickly upon the words which were written there, but his brain at first refused the information thus thrust upon it. He read it a second time; then a third and a fourth.

He did not question the truth of what that small sheet of pinkish paper had told him. He touched it gingerly as it lay before him, exhaling a sickly perfume which nauseated him. A hateful thing; a poisonous thing! It made his wife a liar. He leaned back in his chair and stared at the small deadly object from which emanated, with its hateful odor, a force which was tearing him like the claws of a tiger.

After a time, he folded the thing, and thrust it with the scrap of printed paper into the remotest recess of his desk. Then he arose like one in a dream of anguish and looked out. The nurse still wheeled the perambulator about the lawn. She was crooning the words of a hymn:

The Needle's Eye

BY FLORENCE KINGSLEY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Let the world despise and leave me;
They have left my Saviour, too.
Human hearts and looks deceive me;
You are not like them, untrue!

The pessimistic sentiment of this hymn was not in accord with the faith in human nature which swayed Immanuel Rossi; he believed first, last and always in the inherent Godlikeness of man; in the world-trend toward the divine. Yet in this hour of his soul's humiliation he found comfort in the dolorous words. After a little the better comfort of the "Lo, I am with you always" fell upon him like a benediction. In the sad stillness the old voice—long silent—again spoke to him. "Go back," it said to him; "go back to the way, my child, and all will be well."

Strangely enough, he felt no indignation toward Hilda, but only an aching pity. Should he blame an ignorant child for snatching at a heap of glittering playthings just beyond its reach? As he thought of the small figure, it became shadowed with the curious remoteness of days long past. And so, his head bowed upon his breast, he sat thinking the long, long thoughts of youth and sorrow.

It was Hilda who found him there long past the hour for luncheon. "Have you been here all this time?" she demanded, staring at him with wide eyes of astonishment. Then in a lower voice: "What is it—are you ill?"

He held out his hand to her with so sweet and awful a look in his dark eyes that she drew back involuntarily, putting her hands behind her like a naughty child. "You—you are—ill?" she said uncertainly. "Shall I call some one?"

"No, dear," he said gently; "I am not ill. Come here, Hilda."

She crossed the room and stood at his side, her blue eyes full of doubt, all the old awe of him rushing back upon her as she looked down into his face. A question trembled on her lips, but she dared not utter it.

After all he had nothing to say to her.

He sighed deeply once or twice, holding the small hand in both his own. After a long silence she bent over him and kissed him timidly upon his forehead. He started back as if stung. "Will you sit down, Hilda?" he said, in a strange, low voice. "I have something to tell you."

She sank into the chair he indicated, her heart beating in her throat. A thousand little lying excuses, half formed, started up in her mind to defend her, then dropped back again to grow while he spoke. But it was nothing to be afraid of. He was merely telling her that he must go back to the city; his tenants needed attention; new buildings must be erected. Something must be done for the women and children in the stifling heat. It was the old story—a tiresome story. She shrugged her shoulders.

"I wanted to tell you that baby ought not to stay in the sea air all the summer and autumn," she began, after his slowly syllabled words had ceased. "The doctor says that it would be best to take him to Lenox in September." He made no answer.

After a short, expectant silence she went on. "The Gilbert-Hall estate is for sale, I am told. Would that not be a good place for us?"

"No," he answered quietly.

"Why not?" she urged, her eyes filling easily. "Everybody goes to Lenox in the Fall. And baby will really need the change, to say nothing of me. You used to care a little about me!"

He gave her a strange look that drove the tears back to their source. "I shall not buy any more houses for the three of us," was all he said, but it silenced her.

She wondered at intervals during the evening, after his departure, as to what new "crotchet" had developed in her husband's brain. It occurred to her to look through his desk for light on the subject. But after a cursory examination of several uninteresting business letters, she abandoned research in that direction. "After all," she told herself, "he is only a little queerer than usual."

A MISSIONARY PRINCE

ABOUT two and a half years ago. So mayou, the African Prince, known in this country as Rev. Lewis P. Clinton, returned to his native land to found a mission among his own people, the Bassas.

The Superintendent of the Bassa country has given him for this purpose, two erected two buildings, one with thatch-roof, answering as dormitory for boys; the other a frame building, with zinc roof, glass windows, and doors swinging on hinges, as a home for teachers, girls.

Though born a savage, Mr. Clinton is really a cultured, Christian gentleman, of large ability. In this country, he earned by lecturing, money to carry himself through college, and had $325 left to begin his mission with. Last fall the Free Baptist denomination, of which he is an ordained minister, in their Triennial Conference, voted to adopt the mission as their own. His farm has been his principal means of support, and as he has no money to hire workmen, he has worked through the day and carried on his school at night, teaching, at last account, thirteen children—eleven boys and two girls. He cannot yet afford to take the girls into the Mission, and there are but few families where he is willing to let them work for their board, on account of temptations to which they are subject. The first girl he rescued was to have been sold for $100, two leopard's teeth and a cow. Mr. Clinton hopes soon to be able to do larger and more effective work than in the past. His address is Fortville, Grand Bassa, Liberia, West Coast of Africa. Pittsfield, Me. MARY B. WINGATE.

SUMMER ADVICE.

By One Who Knows.

Keep cool in hot weather.

"How?"

By eating Grape-Nuts every day.

"Rats!"

No, not rats, but a good, sound fact that thousands make daily use of.

Grape-Nuts is a predigested food which makes digestion easy.

It gives the nourishment without the internal heat caused by heavy carbonaceous foods.

You can feel from ten to twenty degrees cooler than your neighbor when you eat proper food that does not overtax the stomach.

Grape-Nuts is made from certain parts of the grain and by mechanical process the starches are changed into grape sugar in the same manner as the stomach would do in the first act of digestion.

The phosphates of the cereals are retained in Grape-Nuts and these and the grape sugar supply the necessary nourishment to body, brain and nerve centers.

Grape-Nuts is a concentrated food giving strength, vitality and coolness to the body and energy and clearness to the brain, in place of the heavy, sluggish, draggy feeling caused by meat, potatoes, etc.

Another point.

It is thoroughly cooked at the factory by food experts and saves you the trouble.

You get it from the grocer and by adding cream it is ready to serve.

No hot stove, no cross cook, no loss of time or exertion as with other food.

Its crisp taste with the delicate sweet of the grape sugar makes it pleasing to the palate of the most critical epicure.

The recipe book in each package of Grape-Nuts gives many pleasing puddings, salads, entrees and desserts that can be made.

Worth a trial and a package will prove it.

FAMOUS WOMEN OF THE 19th CENTURY.

By Mary Lowe Dickinson

HARRIET MARTINEAU

IN this latter day, when we think, feel and hear so much concerning the development and progress of women, treating many of her efforts as if they were the product of our generation, it is mentally a healthful exercise to look at the actual achievements of women of earlier times than ours. A woman who in this day takes a front rank in any one line of good work, claims and receives her crown. In Harriet Martineau, the subject of this sketch, we have a woman who was a political economist, a critic, a novelist, a biographer, an expounder of philosophies and religions, an essayist and a poet; a woman of whom Lord Brougham said, "A deaf girl from Norwich is working a better work for England than is any living man"—a woman who certainly had more influence on public opinion than almost any other English writer, certainly more than any other English woman. She left behind her 103 volumes, written, most of them, while she was under the pressure of daily bread to be won, household tasks to be wrought, constant burdens to be borne for those she loved; yet she never neglected one of these seemingly little things for the author's larger work, but dealt with them all in the true spirit of womanly endeavor, that always may be trusted to do the nearest thing in the sweetest possible way.

In the limits of a two-column sketch, one can hardly hope to do more than to touch the hem of her garment; but if that touch imparts to us any of her own gracious spirit of human helpfulness, it will have been a good thing for us to press so near.

Someone aptly said of Harriet Martineau, that her life was a rare instance of a woman having fallen into her proper place and work; that she did not make books when she ought to have made butter, or butter when she ought to have made books. But yet it could hardly be said that her work was her choice of a life; it was a gradual unfolding to the world and to herself of what a woman could achieve.

This brave, industrious worker, came of old Huguenot stock, the first Martineau having fled from France with that brave company, which, after long and patient endurance of every possible form of religious persecution, was driven out of France. The line descends very straight from that first refugee to Thomas Martineau, the father of Harriet, who was the sixth of his eight children. The picturesque old town of Norwich, with its queer market-place, its old Norman cathedral, its dim, fifteenth century churches, its ancient, half-ruined walls, was the home of her childhood.

As a young girl, the smallness of her father's fortune made it necessary for her to share the household cares, while she joined with her brothers—of whom the famous James Martineau was one—in the severest of their studies. She aided her embarrassed father by teaching music, until her failing sense of hearing forced her to abandon this means of support. She little dreamed at that time that she had another gift that would make her, if not the greatest, at least the most remarkable English woman of her time.

She began her work, as many another woman has done, by writing a volume of poems. She proved her talent as a historian by her story of the Thirty Years' Peace. She showed the mother-heart, that was all her life long passionately devoted to children, in many tales and in a book of devotional exercises for the young.

Of three prizes offered for essays, by a learned society, on The Three Great Religions, she took them all. Her power as a translator appears in Comte, and the philosophic mind showed itself in her Letters on the Laws of Man's Nature and Development, which drew upon her the criticism of her brother James, whose thorough knowledge of the subtleties of German philosophy and fine critical ability made his pen to be dreaded, especially when dipped into the agitated well of family pride and disturbed affection.

Of the twenty volumes written before she was thirty years of age, Miss Martineau cared for only one or two. She regarded these first books as the garments of her mental childhood, outgrown and to be cast aside or left lying about for smaller folk, to whose mental growth they might be fitted. Yet about these books there is still a fresh sweetness and charm, partly lost when it dawned upon her that her mission was to be a teacher of mankind.

No one knew better than did she, even in her youth, that her talent was not genius, and no personal vanity ever tempted her to wear any garment of praise, however cheerfully accorded, if she did not feel it was her own. As she grew older, the dominant characteristic of her mind was an unconquerable old-fashioned determination to benefit and elevate her race. To this end she studied the wants of the people who needed to be benefited and elevated. This study gave the bias to at least twenty of the fifty years of labor which were of most value to the world. It was then that she wrote the forty volumes illustrative of such truths of political economy as she felt the poor ought to know. Five of them treated upon the existing laws governing taxation, four of them touched the Poor Laws, three were given to "Forest and Game Law Tales."

With her cool brain, masculine in its clearness, and her warm heart, womanly in its tenderness, she felt the ignorance and want of the common people, and resolved as far as in her lay, to supply their need. This purpose to bless was her real source of inspiration. We must enter into that purpose if we would think of her books except as dull tales of a generation gone, which no one now would care to read. She had a rare faculty of so placing an existing evil or wrong before the untrained minds of the people, that they knew how to protect themselves against it, and this very power of popularizing truth gave her a mighty influence with the makers of the laws. She handled those imperfect laws as a child would treat her doll, in whose china head she had found the crack, whose bran-stuffed body comes to grief the first sharp prick, and whose weak, flimsy legs yield no adequate support. She did not attempt to make new dolls, but she pointed out all the weak places, so that no one could fail to see them who was not wilfully blind; and then she set to work and mended and dressed and petted and made the best of them afterward.

In her unconquerable sympathy for wage-earners, she wrote for operatives in the manufacturing, for colliers in the mines, for servants in the kitchens, for paupers in the workhouses, for poachers in the forests, for slaves in the colonies, for prisoners in the jails. She taught them how to help themselves, and at the same time stirred the controlling classes to a new sense of responsibility for those less fortunate. There were no manual training schools in those days, but she sought to have the children in the workhouses taught the things that would enable them to win an honest livelihood.

In all these forty books, so close did she keep to nature that they who read her books on the life of housemaids, ladies' maids, dress-makers, find it hard to believe that she had not at some time been out to service. Sometimes her plots are stupid and her incidents uninteresting, but whenever she painted

CHRISTIAN ADDITION*

Seven Steps of Spiritual Attainment in Character-Building

GROWTH and development are expected in the spiritual as in the natural world. No life is stationary. If it is not increasing, it is decaying. The dead stone remains unchanged, but the plant and the tree are ever growing and coming nearer to perfection. So character grows, it may be insensibly, almost unconsciously, and to the observer often imperceptibly, but grow it must and does. As we see in the forest, trees gnarled and twisted, so there are characters that have been deformed, either by injury or by defective surroundings; but the deformity has been incorporated in the growth, and though disfigured the development has been continuous. No man is exactly the same that he was a year ago. It may be that his evil propensities have gained firmer hold upon him, or that they are more under control than they were, or have been weakened or eradicated. Life has not stood still. Consciously or unconsciously, a change has been going on. The positive graces, too, are affected by the passage of time. The man is more or less Christlike than he was. The elements of his character are more akin to the world, or are more in the mould of the Divine than they were. He is, in short, a better or a worse man.

While it is true that God is the giver of all grace, the Scriptures do not teach that the Christian's attitude should be one of passivity. His position rather is like that of the boy in school who depends on his teacher for his education, but must co-operate with the teacher in gaining it. Much depends on the teacher, but the most efficient teacher is powerless, if the boy makes no effort to learn. Growth in grace, as much as growth in education, is the result of effort. So long as the Christian is in the body, he must strive, otherwise he will drift downward. Like a rower children, pallid and hungry, or mothers anguished over the weary struggle with poverty or sin, she made the pictures so real that to this day we wince as if the suffering were going on under our very eye, so that we see its piteous pallor and hear its weary moan.

In the latter part of her life, when she had made her home at Ambleside, in the English Lakes country, she still kept up her work. To many strangers Ambleside became a sort of shrine that held an aged saint, to whom they gladly made pilgrimage. To her friends, it was just a simple home, presided over by as genial and as sweet an old lady as ever petted children, knitted a sock, or poured a cup of tea. To her fireside the great of the whole nation came, to talk with her of its profoundest interests. Here the young struggler for a place and name just sat down and told her all about it. Here the common people brought their pathetic stories of life among the poor, and their little children frolicked about the garden unrestrained while their mothers took the comfort of a chat upon the porch. Here she gathered together the mechanics and their families every winter, for friendly lectures on the subjects calculated to help them in their daily life. She showed them how to make their small means produce the largest income of comfort and content, how to care for their children, how to nurse the sick, how to properly make their clothing, how to buy and dress their food in healthful, economic ways, and above all, how to make the most of their little bits of land.

To make an object lesson of it, she gave to the culture of her own little outlying fields or farm, as she called it, her personal attention. She utilized as far as possible, for example's sake, all the advanced and scientific knowledge that could be illustrated in a two-acre farm. Nothing was too small to be done in the best possible manner. And after she died the people thronged the place, each with a story of her loving kindness. She had helped one to nurse a sick child, she had paid another money for a cow that had died, she had confided to another, whose garden plot was small, the secret of her own abundant crops. The old postmaster said, alluding to the quickened and tender feeling for her in the hearts of the people, "They call her dead, but, sir, she has just begun to live."

And as in the former, so in all those later years, she seemed to stand always alone between the great and the small. She reached on a swift river, inaction results in his being carried with the stream. To attain a perfect character, he must struggle, for the bent of his nature is toward evil. But as the boy who is eager for knowledge is the material the teacher delights to have in his hands, so the Christian, who is eager for spiritual attainment, is sure of supernatural help. Christ comes to his aid, glad to have a follower who aspires to perfection. The passage associated with the Topic sketches the curriculum. Faith lies at the beginning, because it is essential. Unless the boy has confidence in his teacher, he can get no good from him. Desiring to make progress in the divine life, the Christian places himself in Christ's hands to be taught and trained, and is confident he will be wisely and kindly guided. With that faith, as a beginning, and an earnest desire to grow in grace, progress is assured.

Seven steps are cited in the spiritual character-building. It must not be assumed that they are consecutive, or that it is only at the end of the course the graces mentioned at the end of the list are attained; but all the qualities cited must be the object of effort. Nevertheless, the one leads naturally to the next in order. Virtue is a good beginning, because it involves not alone the morality to which we moderns have restricted the word, but the virility and manly strength that was formerly its meaning. Knowledge follows that there may be intelligent progress. To this is added temperance, not only in the matter of intoxicants, but in the self-control that avoids excesses of all kinds. To this succeeds patience, that forbears from retaliation and discontent. Then comes Godliness, or God-likeness, the yearning to become like God in the world. To this should be added brotherly-kindness, the spirit of helpfulness which was so marked a characteristic of Christ, and finally the crown of the series—love, which goes out beyond the immediate circle of brotherhood and takes the whole world to its heart. Are these attainments? Are they not gifts? Surely, and none are so ready to admit the fact as they who possess them. Yet it is no less true that they are given only to the earnest seeker, who, working with God, diligently strives to develop them in his character.

up to great people and great books and great experiences with one hand, and whatever she grasped she passed downward, giving to those below their portion, never forgetting that the bread of life must be broken before the feeble ones could all be fed. So, though the hand that reached upward grasped the truth with almost a manly sense of helping herself to that which was her right, the hand that passed it on downward was as tender as is a mother's hand when she feeds her ailing child.

When, after many peaceful years, she went away from Ambleside that beautiful summer morning, all felt that a soul had passed which had shown a love for progress and freedom, and an interest in her fellow beings most remarkable. Nothing had been too small for her to do, if only it helped human body or soul. The aggregated forces of her heart and brain were a mighty army arrayed against ignorance in the day when education was putting forth but modest claim; against oppression when slavery had not begun to hang its head or hide its face in shame, and against injustice everywhere.

Loving the beautiful lake country as she did, clinging with tender tenacity to the home she had made, and the little field whose every small seed-time and harvest were full of interest to her, one might suppose she would have wished to sleep her last sleep within sound of the lap of the waters of Ambleside. But her dear mother lay in the old cemetery at Birmingham, where the smoke of a thousand forges is scarcely ever broken by sunlight, where the dust of furnaces and the noise of machinery fill the air, as it drifts heavily over the stillness of the graves.

Miscellaneous Questions

J. M., Greensburg, Ind. In olden times did people have dentists to fix their teeth, as we have today? Please tell when dentistry became a recognized profession?

It has only been within the last century that dentistry has been properly ranked as a department of surgery. In the memory of many people now living, the village blacksmith, barber, watchmaker, or other craftsman, served the chief uses of the community as dentist—his function consisting simply in tooth extraction. If a tooth ached, it was pulled out, and that was all there was about it. Only after 1843, did the Royal College of Surgeons of England recognize dentistry, to the extent of providing for it a curriculum of study and awarding certificates of proficiency. Our first dental school was chartered by the Legislature of Maryland in 1839, under the title of Baltimore College of Dental Surgery; in 1820, there were about 100 practitioners in this country; in 1892, 18,000. The first diploma granted a woman was in 1869. Many women are now duly qualified practitioners. Dental surgery has made very rapid advances in this country, and our dentists are said to be the best in the world. America's first native dentist—so far as is known—was John Greenwood, who began to practice in 1788 in New York; he made a set of teeth for General Washington; they were carved out of ivory, and retained in the mouth by means of spiral springs.

H. A. B., Bolton, Tex. When and how did the giving of surnames originate? 2. What author is the best on the subject of surnames?

1. In ancient times man had but one name, usually conferred because of some incident connected with his birth. Thus John (God is gracious) was so named because his parents felt that God was good in giving them a child. A number of men living in the same town, or in neighboring localities, needed, for convenience, some distinguishing appellation, therefore, one was called John Under-the-Hill; another John by-the-Water; these affixes being suggested by their living, respectively, under a hill and by a stream; their descendants' surnames are Underhill and Bythewater; William Goldsmith was the jew-earliest Greek MSS. as the basis and for purposes of revision or correction. Hence a knowledge of Greek is valuable as enabling the student to refer to the earliest MSS. whenever it may be necessary.

Designer, Meriden, Conn. 1. If one has a taste for designing women's and girls' dresses, hats, etc., what course should she pursue to fit herself for practical work? 2. Is the work of retouching negatives well-paid, and is the field overcrowded? 3. Is proof-reading a good profession for women to follow, and where can one be trained for it?

1. Costume designing and millinery are taught in almost all trade schools for girls. The Y. W. C. A., 7 East Fifteenth St., New York City, provides a course of this description at reasonable rates; the Brooklyn and Harlem branches do the same. Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., has a course in costume designing and in millinery. 2. The field is well crowded, but of course there is "always room at the top." Presupposing some artistic ability, and a moderate amount of training, experience and business sense, a living might be made out of it. Better go to the best photographer in your own city, and ask information, advice, and an opportunity to learn, giving your services at first in return for instruction.

Geo. F. Z., Platte City, Mo. Is life worth living? Solomon says, "All is vanity and vexation of Spirit." Job says, "Man is of few days and full of trouble." Life at best is a struggle, and the only thing worth while, is to become Christ-like.

The Christless, Godless, life—the life without a hereafter—would be meaningless and empty. It would be an existence without a purpose; a training or experience without an object; a promise without the performance. But to the Christian, the present life is the near section of eternity. In Christ he has already begun to live forever. He sees stretching out before him the vastest and grandest possibilities. Life under such circumstances is not only well worth living, but it is our duty, and should be our delight, to make the best of it in the widest sense.

Subscriber, Chicago, Ill. A friend of mine disputes the miraculous conception of Christ, and contends, in consequence, that he was only man and not God. Does the doctrine of his divinity depend on the miraculous conception?

Even if the doctrine of the miraculous conception were abandoned, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to account for the facts of Christ's life, by any other theory than that of his being the incarnation of God. If you regard him as man, you must explain how he, a plain peasant, trained as a carpenter, brought up in an obscure Oriental town, could live such a life as he undoubtedly lived, and give utterance to truths which have thrilled the world for nineteen hundred years. Besides this, he spoke with authority, making claims to a higher nature, which if he did not consciously possess that higher nature, would be false claims. His whole life was consistent with his divinity, and, therefore, even persons who reject his miraculous conception, have good ground for believing him to be divine. It is the only theory that explains such a life. There is no need, however, to reject the doctrine of the miraculous conception. The more you study the life of Jesus, the less you will be surprised to learn that the promise of God through the prophets, of the union of divinity and humanity, was literally fulfilled in him.

A letter from Mr. E. B. Parker (expressing the highest satisfaction with his Art Portfolio premium), which recently appeared in these columns, was dated New York by mistake. It should have been dated Delmar, Ia.

Student, New Haven, Conn. If the evolution theory is true, as I believe, and the progress of mankind has ever been upward, what need was there for the Atonement?

If you look at the condition of the world and the state and disposition of men, you must admit that there was urgent need for some uplifting influence.

Whether mankind fell through Adam's sin, as orthodox Christians believe, or developed from a lower order of beings, as evolutionists believe, the moral and spiritual condition of men was one of alienation from God. You need only to be much among children to discover that it is still so. Something was needed to bring men into accord with God; not only to bring about reconciliation, but to remove the thing from men's hearts and lives which keeps them from enjoying his approval. Whatsoever theory of the Atonement you adopt, we know by practical experience that it does this. Wherever men believe in Christ and commit themselves to him they are brought into harmony with God; their hearts are changed; they lead a higher life. No system of philosophy ever produced that effect. The Atonement alone has brought men to God.

I was much amused with the article on pigs in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. My father's were the cleanest animals I ever knew. Naturally, the pig will wallow in the mire. They can be broken of that. My father would put in some straw or hay in one part, then in the food he put a good supply of brimstone. His pigs were almost as white as snow and great pets with the family.

Subscriber, Monticello, Ark. The general who deserts to the enemy, for a consideration, is a traitor. The preacher, who leaves a church to take another, with better pay, may have abundant reasons for his course, and certainly cannot be classed with the general who "goes over to the enemy." If, however, he changes his faith (not merely his denomination), he is an apostate. Such cases, fortunately, are very rare. The great majority of our pastors, are faithful spiritual shepherds, and stand by their flocks, even at heavy personal sacrifice.

MAKING ROOM FOR FALL PREMIUMS

Great Bargains in Damaged Books, Which Must be Removed, for Want of Space

WE have 1,274 RED LETTER TESTAMENTS actually damaged, with all the pages intact, the covers only being injured—some more, some less. We need the space, as our new premium books demand it.

In order to close out the lot, we hereby offer them in quantities to suit—from one to a hundred—at the uniform price of only 25 cents, delivered postpaid.

Please bear in mind that these Testaments are perfect inside, the only damage being in the binding. They are well worth double the money, and were they new, would cost not less than One Dollar. Every order will be filled the day it is received, until the stock is exhausted, when your money will be refunded.

Inquirer, Jersey City, N. J. Is a knowledge of Greek necessary to a person preparing for the ministry?

It is exceedingly valuable, though not indispensable. Almost all of the Old Testament books were originally in Hebrew. The autograph MSS. of both Old and New Testaments have long since perished. After the conquest of the East by Alexander (about 332 B. C.), Greek was spoken very generally throughout the East, and among the Jews also. The O. T. was translated into Greek and used in the Synagogues. About that period the twenty-seven books of the N. T. were written in this Greek (which was not pure Greek, however, but full of words adapted from the Aramaic, Latin and Hebrew). None of our existing Greek MSS. are older than the fourth century. These were followed by translations into many other languages; but wherever there is a doubt, the most eminent scholars always refer to the

To be a successful proofreader, one must learn by experience, in a printing office, beginning as copyholder at $5 to $7 a week at the best. After a certain amount of observation and practice, the student might qualify as assistant proofreader, and then as proofreader on her own account, seeking a situation by the usual channels of advertising, answering advertisements, personal application, etc. The Hefley School of Commerce, Ryerson street, Brooklyn, N. J. B. W., Beverly, W. Va. I would be glad to hear your opinion as to the advisability of some movement recognizing the importance of better salaries for our pastors and a system of prompter payments. Can nothing be done?

These are matters that should be arranged direct between church and pastor, where they are not already settled by the denominational bodies. It is quite obvious that preachers, like authors, artists, physicians, lawyers and other professional men, cannot be "bunched" or "averaged." Their emolument in almost every instance must be dependent upon (1) individual merit or ability and (2) upon the ability of the congregation to carry out its contracts. Where these conditions are both satisfactory, disagreements are rare. We are aware, however, that it sometimes happens that a congregation, even with the best intentions, finds itself unable to fulfil its obligations promptly. It should be a part of the duty of every denomination to make provision for aiding poor congregations to meet

The Coal Miner at Home

...BY...
Francis H. Nichols
Our Special Correspondent

ON a cold winter's evening, when, with your little ones, you are seated before a blazing fire, while the wind sighs and growls outside of your window panes, you are warm and comfortable and cheerful. You look into the fire and you say: "What could we do without coal?" It is coal that draws our locomotives and our steamships. It is coal that means by which our three meals a day are cooked on the range and sixty-five days in the year. It lights our houses. It furnishes the motive power for the mills and factories, in which are made nearly everything that we use and wear. It is hardly too much to say that coal is one of the very greatest of the material forces of our civilization.

Of course you know how much your coal costs you, and you have a general idea that the retail dealer, of whom you purchase it, obtains the coal pile in his yard from a vast, mysterious thing called a "Company," which owns the mine and which has ramifications all over the Union. But as you looked into your grate fire, did you ever think of the miner; at twentieth century troglodyte, who spends his days in a cave, where he can not see the sunlight or the blue sky; this American who, far down below the surface of the earth, is working for "the Company," and who, by blasting and digging and shoveling, orders that you may have those pieces of shining black rock that glow and brilliant in the fire before you? It is safe to say that, of the millions of Americans who depend for light, warmth and locomotion upon coal, not one in a thousand knows anything of the mining troglodyte.

For the last ten weeks, the miner of hard coal has not been working. He is on a strike, and, in consequence, the price of hard coal all over the country has advanced in price. Striking at occasional intervals is a peculiarity of the coal miner. Then, for a short period, the eyes of the country are centered upon him. It's really the only time when he remains above ground long enough for anyone to become acquainted with him. When the miner is working and not striking, he is buried, forgotten, underground. He becomes a troglodyte again.

The miner says that he strikes because he does not receive for his work underground enough pay to enable him to buy bread for his family; that in order to assist him in eking out a miserable existence, his children must be sent into the mines almost in their infancy; that as the result of his underground work and his scanty wages, he is becoming degraded, and that he is sinking to the level of a brute. The company and the operators, on the other hand, insist that the miner is better paid than almost any other mechanic, and they produce voluminous statistics to support their assertions. The Company says that the miner is his own and his only enemy; that all his troubles he brings upon himself; that he is a drunkard and a spendthrift, ignorant, and naturally degraded.

With the merits of this controversy we have nothing to do, rather with the actual condition that confronts us today. The miners are lying in their hovels of homes, refusing to work, refusing to buy at the Company's store, refusing to pay rent for the Company's house, refusing to do almost anything but live, unless their demands are granted. Not a pound of hard coal is being lifted out of the mines. Barbed wire fences surround the collieries, and special policemen with loaded rifles are behind them. This is the situation. Here is perhaps right on both sides of the barbed wire fence. There is certainly also a great deal of wrong.

But now that the miner is once more above ground, and is the object of general attention, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thought that some account of the real and little-known life of the miner and his family would interest its readers. The writer has just returned from a visit to the "strike district," and several days I lived and ate and slept in a miner's boarding-house. I became quite well acquainted with the miner. I talked with representatives of "the Company" and with officials of "the Union," interviewed the miner's clergyman and his saloonkeeper and his employer.

There are about 140,000 miners now on strike. In their composite, is represented about every nationality on earth except Chinese. English, Irish, Welsh, Austrian, Slavs, Hungarians, Italians, and even Syrians go to make up the grand total of the American miner. The miner's home is in a country that he calls "Anthracite." It is an idiosyncrasy of the miner, that if asked where he lives he will never say: "The United States," or give the name of a State. His reply is always "Anthracite." Anthracite is a strip of territory about fifty miles wide, in Eastern Pennsylvania. It includes three fields of coal, whose combined area is less than 400 square miles. From these fields of anthracite comes nearly the entire hard coal supply of the United States. The total output in 1901 was 58,819,626 tons.

Before mines and miners came to Anthracite it was a beautiful land. It embraces the Wyoming and Schuylkill Valleys. Between the mountains flowed clear rushing streams that broke tumultuously over waterfalls. The hills were covered with a verdure of low trees and long grasses. But the quest for his own house, even if he should by some strange accident have money enough to pay for it. The miner must live in a Company house, and for it he must pay the Company a rent of from three to eight dollars a month. He is not paying rent now, because he is striking; but it is charged against him just the same on the Company's books, and it will be "docked" from his wages, when he goes back to work again.

Such are the mining towns where all the land is owned by "the Company." In the vicinity of some of the larger anthracite cities, like Wilkesbarre, are some mining communities where a miner can buy land for his own home. Here the conditions are somewhat better, although the coal-black cloud of ignorance and hopelessness hangs over all alike.

The majority of mining towns have from 3,000 to 5,000 inhabitants. The houses are built along streets that radiate from the mine. The streets are never paved, and along their sides are usually ditches into which is dumped the town's sewerage. The filth-strewn and refuse-laden streets are mud bogs in the spring and fall, and piles of dust in summer. Nobody ever pays the slightest heed to sanitary laws in the arrangement or maintenance of a mining town. Night and day over all the land of Anthracite hangs a cloud of black coal dust. The greenness of the leaves on the trees is dulled, food has a flavor of grime. Everything and every body is dirty. No child is expected to have a clean face, and as for clean linen, it is simply out of the question. Only when attending a strikers' convention does a miner attempt anything more conventional than a flannel shirt. "Even in bed we cannot get away from the mine," a miner in Milnesville explained to me. "The sheets are always sooty." From my own experience I know that this is no exaggeration. In the process of drying white clothes on a line, they take on an accretion of dust which keeps them continually gray.

The miner lives in an awful country, hopeless and wretched and sodden—a land where everything is stunted and distorted and grimy; an environment fit for brutes, but not for men; more like an Inferno than any other country I have ever seen. He never has a vacation except when he is striking or "laid off," and at such times he is usually starving, so that he never has money enough for a journey into the world that is outside of Anthracite. His only change of scene is his occasional move from one mining town to another, in order to enter the service of another "Company." The miner is very ignorant. I was told in Wilkesbarre that not more than one in three of the 40,000 miners of the surrounding towns could read or write. About twenty years ago, when Labor Unions first began to be troublesome, the Companies imported thousands of Lithuanians and Slavs to work in the mines. The immigrants were of the lowest order of European peasantry, accustomed to a few kopeks per day at home. The Companies hoped that they would be content with any wages that they might earn in Anthracite, and that by force of numbers they would supplant union miners. But this hope has failed. The imported miners are to-day the most stubborn members of the Unions, and the idea of breaking them up by importing foreign labor has been abandoned. The Poles and Hungarians are now striking and starving along with the rest, but their dense ignorance and soddiness is a pitiful sight in an enlightened land like our own.

What are called American miners are the children of the Irish, Welsh and English immigrants who worked in the mines when they were started. Nearly all of the American miners were born within sight of the colliery where they work. From earliest boyhood, almost from infancy, they have worked below ground. They have more natural intelligence than the recent Slavs, and some of them who have attended school for one or two terms can read a newspaper, but very few possess an education.

Partly because he is hopeless and partly because he is for coal changed the appearance of Anthracite. Zigzagging across the once green valleys are now huge hills of coal dust, some of them miles in length, the accumulated "screenings" of years. By the process of surface mining called "stripping," the sides of the mountains are peeled of the coal strata and the jagged rock is laid bare in gullies, in which lie pools of green, stagnant water. Every few miles in Anthracite, are giant buildings called "breakers," where the coal is sorted and cleaned for shipment. Care seems always to have been taken to have the breakers as hideous as possible. They have no paint other than coal dust, which coats them a grimy black. Around the breaker usually clusters the mining town. The dwellings usually belong to the Company. In Anthracite they are dignified with the name of houses. In other parts of the country they would more properly be called "shanties." They are never more than two stories high, and they often consist of only two rooms. They are without plumbing or any modern conveniences of civilization. Yet in many mining towns this is the only kind of a dwelling possible for a miner.

The Company owns the land for several square miles around the mine. They will not part with a foot of it at any price. Although a miner may have worked during his entire life for the Company, they will not sell him the land to build

OLD age is a haunting spectre. It has terrorized the generations past more than even the fear of death. The most hated and feared of all the Grecian philosophers was he who used to stand upon the street corners of Athens, frightening the passers-by with these solemn words: "You will be an old man; you will be an old woman." He frightened the passers-by, because most people do not want to become old. They are afraid of coming to the time when they will be a burden to their children and their friends. They are afraid of the time when their earning capacity shall cease, for then, in the race of life, they will be jostled and left far behind by the speed and the strength of the younger generation. They are afraid of the years when they will have to walk with a cane or crutch, or sit in an invalid chair, waiting for the time when the coffin-maker will finish their casket, and the undertaker will order their grave to be dug. To show how depressed some people are over the fact of growing old, I would read a letter which I received some time ago from one of my people:

"Dear Mr. Talmage: Last night, in your sermon, you stated that this is the age for young men. You did not have time to speak one word in favor of the usefulness of the old people. I was sorry. I knew of some sitting near to me who would be heavy-hearted on account of their old age. This morning, an aged member of your church called upon me. He said he was so depressed over your remarks last night that he could not sleep. With tears in his eyes, he said: 'I wonder if old people will be wanted in heaven.' Now, my dear Pastor, I would like you, if possible, to preach a sermon upon the blessings of old age. I would like you to preach a sermon to cheer up those who have passed the zenith of their earthly life, and are sliding down the other side, and nearing the landing place of Eternity. You will, will you not?"

It is in answer to the request in this letter that I am going to speak this morning to the old folks. I will gladly try to refute the popular fallacy that old age, for the Christian, is merely a time for tears, for physical and mental pains, and for depressing helplessness. It was a true thing that an aged minister said to Jacob A. Riis, the New York reformer, "My son, I am on the sunny side of sixty, because I am near to the glories of heaven." The words of my text do not state that an aged Christian's twilight of life upon earth is a gloomy and a sullen sunset. They do emphatically imply that the last days of an aged Christian's earthly life should be among his happiest and most useful days. Those days should be compared to the time when the orchard's branches are bending under the heavy load of the ripened autumnal fruit.

Personal Testimony

The aged Christian is able, from his own experience, to testify of the protecting care of a Divine Father's love. The difference between the testimony of an old man and a very young man, is the difference between knowledge and supposition; between fact and surmise. It is the difference between the words of a veteran who carries the scars, the sword cuts, and the bullet wounds of many battle-fields, and the words of the ruddy-faced youth who has not yet won his shoulder-straps, or seen anything but the recruiting officer's papers. It is the difference between the experience of an old pilot of the Hugu River, the most dangerous navigable river in the world, who has for many years guided the boats up to the wharfs of Calcutta, and the experience of the cabin boy, who has not yet learned how to handle a wheel. It is the difference between the diagnosis of the old, gray-haired physician, who has prescribed for hundreds of fever patients, and the diagnosis of the young medical graduate who has just received his diploma. It is the difference between the words of the young statesman just elected to Congress, and the words of the first President of the United States, when he was about to leave the Presidential chair for the last time. When George Washington delivered his farewell address at the inauguration of John Adams, the American people did not reverence his words because he wielded a more trenchant pen than Thomas Jefferson, or because he was a more impassioned orator than Patrick Henry. They revered his words because he spoke as one having authority. He spoke as one who had led the American armies during the darkest days of the Revolutionary war. He spoke as one who had stood at the helm when the Ship of State was just launched. He spoke as one who had been willing to offer his life as a sacrifice for his country's good. The American people listened to him in the same spirit with which the French audience heard the aged patriot,

Lafayette, when the chairman introduced him with these beautiful words: "Fellow citizens: I would have you listen reverentially to the speaker of the day, because sixty years of a pure, noble life are about to address you."

My aged Christian friend, there may be other brains just as keen as yours. There may be other hearts just as willing to make sacrifice for their Lord and Master as yours; but no Christian can as powerfully testify of the protecting care of a Heavenly Father as you can testify, unless he can truly speak out of his own experience. The saint who is nearing the end of life has the clearer view of heaven. You can speak about the goodness of God from personal experience, as my father spoke to me a few years before his death, by telling me this remarkable incident: When he was a young minister, he used to keep a diary in which he made a record of all the requests he made to God, concerning matters which were then weighing upon his heart. By some mishap, he lost that diary, and he forgot about those prayers he had offered. Some twenty or thirty years later he found that diary. When he opened it and read the many requests that he had made, nearly a quarter of a century before, he found out that God had answered every one of his prayers. God had answered them with better results than even his faith at that time had dared to hope. So the aged Christian opens the book of memory. As he fingers the many soiled leaves of that book, he testifies how God cared for him when he was a young man. He testifies when he was middle-aged, and he testifies how the love of God is protecting and caring for him now that he is an old man. He testifies just as the aged Psalmist testified of God's goodness when he wrote: "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." He can testify, as did Joshua when he assembled the people together at the close of his long life, and said: "Behold this day I am going the way of all the earth, of all the good things which the Lord spake all are come to pass, and not one thing hath failed thereof." He testifies as an honest witness carries conviction in a courtroom, because he tells of that which he has seen and personally experienced. He testifies as one having authority. Never let any man tell you that the aged Christian's influence is a useless influence. The Bible distinctly says, "They shall still bear fruit in their old age." No better fruit can it bring than the personal testimony of God's faithfulness, which your children will never forget. When sceptics assail them with doubts, they will be able to say, "My father put God's promises to the proof, and he declared that he had found them true."

One night, in a large infidel meeting, an old gray-haired Christian woman arose, and addressed the speaker in these words: "I would like to ask the speaker what his infidel beliefs have ever done for him? My Gospel religion sustained me when I was left a poor widow, with six fatherless children to support. My religion has given me hope and courage, when I have had to stand by the brink of an open grave. My religion has made me a purer, truer, braver woman to face the struggles of life. That, sir, is what my faith in Jesus Christ has done for me. What have your infidel beliefs done for you?" The infidel could not answer. The whole audience realized that the Christian woman was speaking out of her own life's experience. So the mightiest witnesses for God are those whose Christian testimonies are the outgrowths of the many, many years that are gone.

Grandfather's Love

The aged Christian influences for good those who are near to him, because he is able to lavish upon them a wealth of boundless, fervent, tender Christian affection. While we are young and even middle-aged, we spend most of our time in doing for others, rather than in showing the sweet manifestation of our affections. We are like Martha, who went into the kitchen to cook Jesus a dinner, rather than like Mary, who sat at the feet of Christ.

When Jesus, sad and weary, longing sore
For love's sweet service, sought the sisters' door,
One saw the heavenly—one the human guest,
But who can say which loved the Master best?

While we are young or middle-aged, we are like the busy merchant, who spends most of his time in the store and the office in order to earn money enough to support his children, rather than like the old grandfather and the grandmother, who spend most of their time in spoiling their grandchildren, until at last, the married daughter turns and says, "Father and mother I believe you love my children better than you ever loved me when I was young. Anyway, you pet them far more than you ever petted me." Many a mechanic has but little time to fondle or caress his own child. He has to leave home for work before the children are out of bed. He does not return until late at night when the babies have been again tucked away in their cribs. Many a time have I heard a grown-up woman say, "When I was young I used to long for mother to take me up into her arms, and have her love me and kiss me. But mother never had any time."

The Christian's Old Age

A Son's Discovery

Editor Brown said that it took him nearly a fifth of a century to find out how much his father loved him. When he was a boy at home, his father was always busy earning money to support the family. Sometimes he was self-absorbed, gruff and stern, and seemingly harsh. But, after a while, his father's health broke down. Then the boy felt he ought to leave home, as there were too many mouths to fill from his father's scanty savings. The morning he left, the old man walked down the road with him. Then the feeble old father put his hand upon the young man's shoulder, and tears came into his eyes, and his lip quivered, as he said: "My boy, I don't want you to leave home. As long as I have a crust of bread, my child, I am ready to share it with you. You had better come back." "Then," said Editor Brown, "for the first time in my life I realized the immensity of my father's love. At that day, a sweet-throated songster kept singing in my heart: 'He loves me. He loves me. Father loves me. Yes, he loves me.' And when, some years later, an evangelist compared God's love to a father's love, arose in that meeting and gave my heart to God. I knew that my earthly father loved me. Yes, I knew that he loved me." So, the Christian's old age, is the time when he can best demonstrate the wealth of his affection for those who are near and dear to him, and when he can best influence them for good.

The statement that the aged Christian can exercise a mighty influence for good over the lives of those who are nearest and dearest to him, is especially true, if those dear ones, in turn, have children of their own. I do not believe a man ever fully appreciates the love of a parent until he himself is married and has babies about his own family table. It is only after a man has had the worries and the anxieties of his own home troubling his heart, it is only after he has stood by the side of the cradle and nursed his baby boy through the awful sickness of diphtheria; it is only after he has got his own family burial plot, and has dug therein a little grave for one of his own babies, that he begins to fully appreciate what his father and mother in their time have done for him. So, my aged Christian friend, if you have children who have children of their own,

Your Work is Not Yet Done

Now that your own children feel so grateful to you on account of your past and present love, you can mold them, and influence them, and purify them by that same love better than ever before. Perhaps, by that love, you can influence them even more for Christ and eternity now, than when they were young men and young women, standing upon the threshold of life.

The aged Christian is able to inspire the spirit of reverence in the hearts of many with whom he comes in contact. This spirit is a growth, and not an act. It is a germ seed which often takes years and years to develop, and not an entity, which springs into being at a jump or a bound. It generally starts away back in the nursery. If the child learn to respect his mother, then it is very easy for him to learn, as a boy, to respect his teachers; if the boy learn to respect his teachers, then it is very easy for him, as a young man, to learn to respect his Christian employers. If a young man respects his Christian employers, then it is very easy for him, as a middle-aged man, to learn to respect the aged Christian servants who for years have been living at the Divine Master's feet. If the middle-aged man respect God's aged Christian servants, then it is very easy for him to learn to respect the God whom those Christians serve, and to communicate that respect to others.

Thus, God uses your physical weaknesses, and your mental helplessness, for a purpose. When he sees you, an aged Christian parent being tenderly cared for in your old age by a loving son; when he sees that son giving to you the best room in the house, and the easiest arm-chair, and the softest bed; when he sees that son trying to make your last days upon earth happy and peaceful, then we can imagine him saying: "That young man who is caring so tenderly for his aged Christian parent, is capable of great love for me and my children. The young man who is true to his old mother, by my grace, will always be true to me. I will honor him because he has honored one of my aged servants." Did not God say in his Ten Commandments, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." When the young minister respects the old minister, and tries to honor the venerable, white-haired missionary of Jesus Christ, then the Lord knows that the young man wants to honor him, because the young minister has tried to honor God's aged disciple. When the young physician respects the old Christian physician, then the Lord knows that the young man would like to be as the old physician is. What we admire in others, that we would generally like to reproduce in ourselves.

Rewarded by an Empress

A beautiful German story relates how one day a little girl named Jeannette witnessed a great army review. Thousands upon thousands of spectators crowded around the stand, before which the Emperor was to watch the passing regiments. While Jeannette was seated in the stand, she saw an old feeble woman trying very hard to get where she could see. The little German girl said to herself, "It is not right for me to sit here, when I am strong and well and can stand, while that poor, feeble old woman can see nothing. I ought to honor old age, as I want some one to honor me when I am old." Then she gave up her seat to the old woman, and went and stood in the crowd. But while Jeannette was standing upon her tiptoes, trying in vain to see, a courtier of the Emperor, covered with old lace, elbowed his way to her side, as he said, "Little girl, her Majesty would be pleased to see you in the royal box." When the abashed child stood before the Empress, she graciously said, "Come here, my daughter, and sit with me. I saw you give up your seat to that old woman, and now you must remain by my side." So God honors those who honor his servants. God specially honors those who honor the aged and seemingly helpless disciples, whose earthly pilgrimages are early ended.

The aged Christian is a living evidence that for most of us earthly life is to be short. Sixty or seventy or eighty years are a very long time to live; but most of us will never live so long. Aye, most of us will never even reach middle life. If you speak to an aged Christian, you will find that he is like a November leaf, hanging almost solitary and alone, after the thousands and the tens of thousands of autumnal leaves have been torn from their branches by the equinoctial winds. You will find that most of his contemporaries died when he was comparatively young, that nearly all the rest died when he was in middle life, and that only a very few companions of his youth are left to walk by his side. The statisticians declare that a third of the human race die in infancy. At least one-third of the remainder die before twenty-one years of age have been reached, and only six or seven per cent of the human family live to be sixty years of age or over. So the mere presence in this world of an aged Christian, with ninety-three or ninety-four per cent. of his contemporaries gone, is a perpetual warning that we must be about our Father's business, or the death summons will come, and we shall find that we have accomplished nothing.

The aged Christians ought to appeal to us in the same way that the final review of the Potomac Army appealed to the spectators in Washington in 1865. In that passing army the places of the dead were kept vacant. As regiment after regiment, and brigade after brigade marched past the President of the United States, there were in some lines only ten or fifteen men. The vacant places showed that hundreds upon hundreds, and thousands upon thousands of soldiers who went forth to battle never came back. Those ragged lines and those torn battle-flags showed that there was another great army of the Potomac that day sleeping in its grave trenches. As the little band of aged Christians marches past us to-day, we see that it is a mere remnant of a great host which once started out marching side by side. The white lips of the dead as well as the trembling lips of the living Christian veterans beside us are speaking entirely different words from those with which the Grecian philosopher frightened the trembling Athenians. The dead lips of the aged Christian contemporaries are saying to us, "Most of you will never be old men. Most of you will never be old women. Therefore, what you are to do for Christ, you must do soon, or you will never do it at all."

Messages to Heaven

Perhaps this may be a chimerical fancy, but I believe that some of our aged Christians now living may be lingering upon this side of the River of Death, in order to carry to heaven to our departed loved ones the latest news about the dear ones on earth. You know the Bible declares that the celestial messengers are continually ascending and descending between earth and heaven. Jacob's dream was not all a fanciful dream. The sleeping son of Isaac saw the angels ascending and descending the ladder which connected earth with heaven. So I believe that the aged Christians are lingering this side of the Jordan for awhile, in order to carry the Gospel news about ourselves to our loved ones. I remember well when a dear old elder of the Brooklyn Tabernacle was dying, my father turned to him and said: "Well, Mr. Nichols, good-by for a little while. We shall soon meet again. But as you are going ahead of me to the Celestial land, will you hunt up my boy DeWitt, and give him my love?" And the old dying elder said: "Yes, Doctor Talmage, I will, I will." When the widower Bishop Haven was dying, he turned to his mother and said: "Mother, after I have first seen the Lord, I shall want to hunt up my dear wife. I shall give to her your love. Then I shall want to rest for the first thousand years in the green pastures, by the side of the still waters, with my head in the lap of my Mary."

And, if some of our aged Christian friends are waiting for a little while in order to carry the latest Gospel news to the dear ones on the other side of the Jordan, what will they be able to tell our fathers and mothers, who have gone beyond and are awaiting our coming? Will they be able to tell them that you and I love the Lord Jesus? Will they be able to tell our loved ones that they must keep a place by their side for us in one of the heavenly mansions? Oh, my brother and sister, I see by the tears in your eyes that you are anxious, awfully anxious, in reference to the message which our aged Christian friends shall have to bear. Shall we plead with God that our dear aged friends may be allowed to live just a little while longer, so that we all may, here and now, give our hearts to Jesus? Then, ye aged Christian friends, carry the news, as soon as you may, to that bright and happy land. Carry the news that, by the blood of Christ, we have all been cleansed from sin.

Called Back by Prayer

That was a significant experience that Archbishop Leighton had in one of his illnesses. It was thought that he was dying, but in answer to the prayers of his friends he was raised from the threshold of the grave. But the good man did not share the gladness of his friends. He said: "I did not want to get well. I am an old man, and most of my friends are on the other side. In my last sickness I felt I was like a weary mariner sailing over the sea. I was coming near the Harbor of Peace. I could see a great host of my departed loved ones coming down to the shore and waving to me, and I was waving back. I could recognize their different faces. But just as I was about to enter the Harbor of Peace, a great storm arose, and I was driven back. The storm drove me far out of sight of the heavenly land. Now I must sail the weary voyage of life over again." And so, my aged, Christian friends, I believe that you are the favored ones. You are the Christians who will carry the message to our dear ones as well as to your own. When you go, I want you personally to take to my mother and father my love, just as my father sent his love to his boy. Tell them for me, that by the grace of God, we all want to meet them soon.

Thus, ye aged Christians, I want you to realize that the words of my text were written for you. "They shall still bring forth fruit in their old age," means that your work and usefulness will not be finished until you draw your last breath, until you take your glorious departure. I want you to realize that your work in life is just the same kind of work as was that aged farmer's, who was planting some young trees one day, when a neighbor came along and said, "What are you planting those trees for? You will never live long enough to see them grow up." "No," answered the old man, "I never expect to see them grow up. But my grandfather planted yonder aged trees so that I could play under them and pluck their fruit, and I want to plant these trees so that my children, and my children's children can eat of their fruit after I am dead." So, aged Christians, as your aged parents sweetened your life when you were young, you, by the blessing of God, are sweetening ours. May your work be to you a happy work, until at last the angel of the Resurrection comes to call you to your eternal reward. May we be as faithful to our trust as you, who are still faithfully bearing fruit in your old age.

A GOSPEL MISSION ON THE WAVES

EVANGELIST GEO. E. BENN

ABOUT eight o'clock every morning, summer and winter, a trim little yacht can be seen steaming out of the Erie Basin, New York, and heading for the lower harbor. She is the mission yacht Ilene, George E. Benn, captain, and a crew of Gospel workers, and she has a perpetual charter in the Master's service to carry the "glad tidings" to those who toil upon the sea. Every week, at least seventy-five foreign ships enter the port of New York. Among the seamen of those ships Captain Benn distributes magazines and religious literature, dropping here and there a Gospel seed, as opportunity offers. He is always a welcome visitor on an incoming ship's deck, this sturdy little Gospel mariner. Very often, the captain of a newly-arrived ship wishes to go ashore, being anxious to see his shipping brokers to whom his cargo may be consigned. Captain Benn is ready with the taut little Ilene to take him up the bay. This service, trifling though it may seem, has often been the means of winning for the Gospel yacht and its commander the sympathy of the ship's officers, and has ultimately resulted in permission to conduct religious work among the crew.

All day long, and frequently till long after nightfall, the Ilene keeps up her rounds among the newly-arrived steamers and sailing vessels. It is sometimes after ten o'clock before the little boat is churning the waves on her homestretch. But Captain Benn, who on many occasions is accompanied by his devoted wife, does not leave the bay until the last ship has been visited, the last kind word spoken, the last prayer said before the night-cloud settles over the great harbor.

It is an interesting experience to go down the bay on a trip with the Gospel yacht. She runs lightly alongside the newly-arrived ship, which lies at anchor. Some of Captain Benn's mission workers board the ship, carrying magazines and religious papers for the crew. Officers are just as eager for these as the men. If the visit happens at the noon hour, or after the men have ceased work for the day, permission is usually given to assemble the seamen in the fore-castle, where a short, simple religious service is held. Many a wandering sailor has been turned to God from a life of sin, by the earnest pleading of the workers. Many a moral shipwreck has taken Christ as his Pilot, and is now safe from the storms, and assured of a happy and peaceful anchorage when the voyage of life is over.

Speaking of the result of the mission on the bay, Captain Benn said to the writer: "I have known many seafaring men who were drunkards, but they found Christ through our mission work and they are drunkards no longer. Similarly, there are some who were dishonest, but now with change of hearts, they rob no more. Many of the sailors were formerly shockingly profane. Now some of the profane have reformed and reverence the name, esteeming it now as too precious to be taken in vain. Others, who were steeped in sin and unbelief, are now trusting in and worshiping Him who saved the seamen of the fishers' fleet on Lake Galilee.

"Many of the ships among which we work sail for China, India, South Africa or the west coast of South America, which means a six-months' voyage, and very often the only reading material the men have is that which our mission yacht distributes among them. During the long weeks and months when they are at sea, they read and reread every scrap of literature I give them, even committing a great deal to memory. When our boat comes alongside, the sailors gather around us as eagerly for reading material as starving men would for something to eat. We try to put on every ship fifty magazines, one hundred religious papers, Bibles and a few Testaments. We experience considerable difficulty in securing magazines. They are donated to us by those who have read them and laid them aside." It may be that some readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will feel disposed to help Captain Benn to keep his little mission yacht stocked with good religious literature and magazines for the "deep-water sailors" to read on their long voyages. If any packages are sent they should be prepaid. Captain Benn, whose address is 189 St. Mark's avenue, Brooklyn, will gladly give any further information that may be wished concerning the Gospel Mission in New York bay.

NUMBERS 10: 11-13, 29-36

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- PSALM 31: 3:
"FOR THY NAME'S SAKE, LEAD ME AND GUIDE ME"

THE SHEPHERD'S CARE

out of Egypt, they were only a crowd, but now they are a well-organized nation. Everybody knows his place, and just what he is to do. Moses is the great captain over all, under God the Great Leader of the host. There are at least four hundred thousand tents to be struck, and among them the church tent—the Tabernacle. But there is no confusion. The Levites—a company of twenty-two thousand—know that it is their duty to take down the Tabernacle and carry it. And when they are ready, they take their places, and in front of them, at the left, at the right, and behind them, the other twelve companies or tribes take their places in the line of march. The place of honor is given to the Levites, because they had no share in the making of the golden calf. They are in the centre of the host, because it is the safest place for the things which are parts of God's home.

All faces are upturned, awaiting the final word from God to move forward. The command comes through Moses. Now they start. They are not cumbered with much baggage, for they have no need to carry extra clothing, God is going to keep their clothes from wearing out. They are not even carrying food for their journey, for they know that God is going to feed them with bread from heaven. They do not carry water, for God can make water come out of dry rocks. How blest they are in all temporal things. And what a hope is before them! The land to which God is leading them is to be their very own. They have God's promise that each family shall have its home, its "own vine and fig tree."

There is only one man in all that party who does not want to go. His name is Hobab. He is the father, or perhaps, the brother of Moses' wife. He is not an Israelite, but his home is in that part of the country through which they are about to journey. Moses is troubled because Hobab refuses to go, and he tries to persuade him. He says: "Come with us, and we will do you good." Moses wanted Hobab to learn how to love and obey the true God. This Hobab did not care to do. "But," said Moses, "you can do us good. You can help us very much on our journey, because you know the way so well." Still Hobab says he will not go, and he leaves Moses, and goes to live with his own people. We might ask the question how did Moses come to have such a relation? During the forty years that Moses was a shepherd he had lived where Hobab had his home, and Moses had taken for his wife, Zipporah, who was a woman of Midian.

Hobab goes his way, and the host of the Israelites moves on. Moses does not lose courage, because Hobab will not go with them to guide them. Moses' faith is in God. He knows it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man, better even than to put confidence in princes, for Hobab was a prince among his own people. Moses has no bitter words of regret and sorrow to speak, but instead he utters a prayer to God: "Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered." Moses is not afraid to go anywhere with God for his leader. The march is to be a long one, but it is to be taken by short and easy stages. God will give the signal to rest, when the people are weary.

The journey from Egypt to Canaan has ever since been a favorite illustration of the journey of life, especially of the Christian's journey from sin to full salvation. Hymn writers have sung of it, in "Lead, Kindly Light," "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah," "He leadeth me," and many other songs. When P. P. Bliss died, it was found that the last hymn which he had set to music, was one in which are the words:

So, I go on, not knowing, I would not, if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God, than walk alone in the light.

I would rather walk with him by faith, than walk alone by sight.

Here is a new and unfamiliar hymn on the first stage of Israel's journey, by Mrs. E. B. Thorne:

They journeyed on through the wilderness
With the mountains on either side;
Behind them the foeman was pressing sore,
Before lay the turbulent tide.

READY to start at a moment's notice!" And the "notice" has been given. It is a signal from God to the mighty host of Israel, numbering about two millions of people, including little children, fathers, mothers and grandparents. And what is the signal? It is the moving forward of the fiery pillar, which represents God. But why this unusual stir? Many times before, the Israelites have seen the same signal and obeyed it. But they have not had a signal for almost a year, for God has wished them to stay in one place, in order that they might make the Tabernacle and learn how to obey his laws. When they came

Then they cried to the Lord in their stress and fear
In that great and terrible day,
And lo, they were saved, and their foes o'erthrown,
For Jehovah opened the way.

O, many and many a time, I, too,
As I traveled earth's deserts o'er,
Have entered a path that was mountain-walled,
With the raging seas before.
But I cried to the Lord in my fear and stress,
In my dark and sorrowful day,
And he came himself to my soul's relief,
And lo, he opened the way.

They first took their journey according to the commandment of Jehovah. What a life that would be, in which no step was taken that was not "according to the commandment of Jehovah!" A life, in step with God, in which we wait, when he bids us wait, and move forward promptly, whenever and wherever he bids us go! In ancient times in the Orient, it was a custom to bear aloft before a caravan at night a grate of burning coals, to show the way. By a like symbol, only of miraculous fire and cloud, in which God himself dwelt, Israel was led on. And we are led no less wonderfully to-day. In temporal things, for example, they had the manna from heaven, and water from the rock, and quails from the wilderness; but his royal bounty is greater still to-day, when even workmen have more comforts than kings had a few generations ago. Willie, saying his evening prayer, stopped midway and said: "Mother, why don't we say, 'Give us our daily bread and butter?'" Sister Milly spoke up: "Perhaps God wants us to give him a chance to give us more than we ask for. Just think of the nice things he adds to our daily bread! Berries, and melons, and peaches, and pineapples, and cherries, and oranges, and bananas, and—"

Willie broke in: "Just the way mother puts in the lunch-box a piece of candy, or a handful of peanuts, besides all the nice bread and butter. There wasn't any need of God making melons, and pears, and peaches, was there?" "No," said his mother, "it was all of his royal bounty. You know when the Queen of Sheba asked certain things of Solomon, he gave her more than she asked, 'of his royal bounty.' So God gives not only necessities, but comforts, 'fruits of all kinds in rough coat, or smooth rind, or bearded husk, or shell,' as Milton pictured them." Willie exclaimed: "I'm going to write poetry about peaches and things when I grow up. God is so good, folks oughtn't to say 'Thank you,' in just a common way."

How much there was in that journey of Israel to show us how to make our own journey of life less sinful and so less sad! Though God was so manifestly leading them, how much they worried and murmured, when they should have trustfully trudged along!

It reminds us of a woman journeying by our own swift and easy method of the railway train. It was her first railway ride, as everybody very soon found out by her fussy anxiety. She spent as much time settling her baggage and fixing her clothes as if she were going to the world's end, instead of the next station. A relative, who was with her, called her attention to the beautiful scenery they were passing, but she was too busy fixing her veil to look. "Pretty soon, John," she said. "As soon as I get everything fixed all right, I'm going to sit back and enjoy myself. I've always been lottin' on a ride in the cars." But she had hardly fixed all her boxes and bundles before the forty-mile ride was ending. As her station was called, she exclaimed: "Why I've hardly had a mite of pleasure yet! If I'd thought we were going to stop so soon, I wouldn't have wasted all my time fussin'." Many a soul comes to the end of life's journey with a like regret. If he had realized that life would be so soon over, he wouldn't have wasted it in worry and trifles.

We should fill all the hours with the sweetest things,
If we had but a day;

We should drink alone at the purest springs,
On our upward way.

We should be from our sinful souls set free,
To work and to pray,

And to be what our Father would have us to be.

If we had but a day. —Mary Lowe Dickinson.

To the Israelites, the hardships and delays of their journey to Canaan, which might have been made in eleven days, but took forty years, must have been a great trial, but all of its experiences were needed to develop moral strength. And so are the struggles that come to us in our journeys of life. Walter, a little lame boy, with a paralyzed leg, was carried about by his loving father, until the latter realized that there was small chance of recovery unless the child exercised the feeble member. And so the father took his gold watch from his pocket, held it before little Walter's eyes, and then drew it slowly along the floor. Walter reached for it, and as it was moved just beyond his reach, crawled after it, painfully and slowly, but it was for his good. Every day father and crippled child played at this game, and every day Walter crawled a little quicker and a little farther, and with less and less of pain. And so Walter Scott learned to walk, he who became afterwards the great story-writer. And so God develops us by painful progress in the path of life into strength and swiftness as his messengers.

ORIENTAL IN TRAVELING GARB

A yet more pertinent illustration of how delays in our journeys, as in Israel's, may be providential blessings that really speed us in the way to heaven, is the story of a Mr. Findon and family, delayed by a great snow-storm. The two post-horses that drew the man and his wife and daughter, refused to pull the stage any further through the deepening snow, and so the load was discharged at an inn. The only room where they could wait was engaged by a Frank Hardy, a Christian young man, who was then at church, and there the landlord placed them temporarily. Hardy, on his return, shared the room during the Sabbath evening as a sitting-room, generously agreeing to let the delayed family have it for the night, while he would sleep by the fire. During the evening, Mr. Findon discovered a full set of chess while looking through the bookcase. He exclaimed: "How fortunate! Now I can while away a dull evening. Do you play, sir?" Hardy replied: "I would play on any other day but this. I promised one of the best of mothers to reverence the Lord's Day." "You are right," replied Mr. Findon, "but surely you must find Sunday very dull with nothing but religion." "No," said Hardy, "I enjoy my Sundays." Perhaps to atone for the offensive proposal and in consideration of generous hospitality, Mr. Findon said presently: "Suppose we muster up a Bible or two and read a chapter all around." "Nonsense," said his wife. The husband persisted, he was in earnest, and the plan was carried out. "Not such a dull evening after all," he said. "I declare we've been reading over an hour. If we had a prayer-book—"

Hardy interposed: "If you don't mind, I will offer up a prayer." The next morning, the travelers continued their journey. Years afterward, on a Sunday, a Christian friend of the Findons, who knew them only as scoffers, was in a Continental city, and saw by the papers that the Findons were in another hotel in the same city. He went with another friend of the family to call. On being shown to the room, they paused at the open door, fearing they were intruding, for they found Mr. Findon and his wife and daughter all reading the Bible. "No intrusion," said Mr. Findon, with a twinkle in his eye, at the surprise of his callers. "Bibles for our friends, daughter." And then he told how that snow-storm years before had delayed him; and how the moral courage of Frank Hardy in keeping the Sabbath had impressed him; and how that Bible reading had been kept up ever since in their once worldly, now Christian home.

Come thou with us and we will do thee good. Hobab, the Midianite brother-in-law of Moses, who knew from childhood the country through which Israel was to go, might have been of great service as a guide, and Moses repeatedly urged him to go for that reason as well as because of family ties. But Hobab would not be persuaded. He would go back to his own heathen Midian, near at hand, rather than go on to Canaan with God's people. The Hobab of to-day, is the man who might be of signal service in the Church, but refuses all invitations, and chooses the Midian of a worldly, selfish life instead. In many cases, our Hobabs believed in the Church as an influence for good. They believe their boys are less likely to be immoral, if they go to Sunday School. These Hobabs will sometimes even go to church themselves, but they will not join the march of God's host. Sometimes, Hobab is even a praying man, but will not connect himself with the Church. He should be reminded that no one has a moral right to do what, if the whole world followed his example, would produce more harm than good.

ignorant, the miner is shiftless. He generally marries before he is twenty-one years old. His wife is the daughter of a miner. She, too, knows no other horizon than the coal dust of the mining town. She has the same limited education, the same grimy ideals. Like him, she is inured to the same low surroundings; like him, she can have no hope and no ambition. The miner and his wife live in a Company house. The comforts of their home are considerably less than those of the stable of an ordinary coach horse. From the start it is with them a struggle to live; all saving for future needs, all refinements and civilizing influences are out of the question. Into this home their large family of children is born. The mother tries to keep the boys alive until they are eight or nine years old, when the father makes out for each son in turn, an affidavit that he is twelve years old. He then leads him to the mine boss and says, "Here's another kid for you."

"All right, we have need for him in the breaker. Forty cents a day," and another miner's life is begun.

When the colliery whistle blows at seven o'clock in the morning, the miner must be in the "cage," as the elevator is called that carries him eight hundred or a thousand feet down the shaft. In his cap he wears a Davy safety lantern,—his only light for ten hours. By its glimmer he must drill his holes in the wall of coal; insert his dynamite cartridges, and then explode them by fuming fuses. After each blast, he must with his pick break up the huge blocks of coal into lumps small enough to be loaded into the cars. He has no noon hour in which to eat his luncheon. In the intervals between blasts, and while waiting for cars, he can reach his black hand into his dinner pail and take out a piece of bread or salted meat, which his wife has prepared for him. This is the only refreshment he receives for the ten hours of his day's work.

From the foot of the mine shaft extends a long gallery called "the gangway." At right angles with it, are short alleys in which the miners work at the coal vein. The alleys are about one hundred feet apart, and the miners in two adjacent alleys work towards each other. As the coal is removed an empty room is created. Its roof and sides must be supported by wooden props to prevent a "cave in." The placing of these props in position can often be accomplished only with great labor, for which the miner receives no pay. The Company pays him only for coal. The props are for his own protection, with which the Company has nothing to do. "Yes," says the striker, in reply to this argument, "it is true that the props protect our lives by preventing the roof from falling on us, but they also save the Company's property from destruction, therefore we want to be paid for placing them."

There is hardly a minute of the ten hours of a miner's work-day when his life is not in danger. With all the precautions he may take in placing props, the walls of the alley or room where he is working will occasionally collapse and he will be crushed to death.

The mines are ventilated by an intricate system of fans, which pump air from the surface through the galleries. But in spite of the fans, a "pocket" is formed, the gas ignites, and a section of the mine explodes, killing scores of miners. Besides these constant risks, there are the lesser dangers of premature dynamite explosions and burning coal that becomes ignited by the friction of the drills. John Mitchell, president of the Miners' Union, and leader of the present strike, said to me when I talked with him in Wilkes-barre, that "for every 119,000 tons of coal mined in Anthracite one man is killed, and during every ten hours that the mines are operated, two miners lose their lives."

Beside the gas, the atmosphere of a miner's life is permeated with incessant clouds of coal-dust. This, in the course of years, forms a deposit in the miner's lungs, and the result is "miner's asthma," with which nearly all over thirty-five are afflicted, and from which many die. In their children the inheritance of their father's asthma manifests itself in weak lungs and paroxysms of coughing. I saw few boys and girls who did not have round shoulders and narrow chests.

On the walls of the little parlor of the boarding-house where I lived in Edwardsville, were photographs of miners who were relatives and friends of the miner's widow who was my landlady. One day she told me about the originals of the pictures. "That was my husband," she said. "He died of the asthma two years ago next December. That young man was my daughter's husband. He was burned in Shamokin. He left four boys, the oldest twelve. They work in the breaker. That lad whose picture is over the mantel was my son's best friend. A gas explosion killed him last year." They had all worked in the mine, and the mine had killed them!

In mining towns, where "the Company" owns all the land, there is usually only one store. This belongs to the Company, and here the miner makes all his purchases. Here he buys the powder and tools he needs in his work, his groceries, the calico dresses for his wife and the overalls for his sons. The amount of his monthly bill is deducted from his wages. No one else can open a competing store in the town for the same reason that no miner can hire his own house. The Company will not sell any land to another storekeeper, and will not rent him a building. Consequently, the Company store has a monopoly, with no bad debts and the privilege of charging any price it likes. Company stores have long been a bone of contention in coal strikes, and, theoretically at least, they are no longer as much of a hardship to the miner as formerly. By a recent Pennsylvania law, no Company can now compel its employees to deal at its store.

The average amount of wages that a miner in the land of Anthracite receives for his labor is not an easy question to determine. Any one connected with "the Company" will tell you that a miner who is sober and industrious can make from $2 to $3 per day. When I put the question to Mr. Mitchell he replied in the quick fashion of a labor leader: "$1.42 is the average day's pay for a miner in Anthracite. No question about it—that's a fact the bosses can't get around."

Believing that the truth might lie between the two extremes, I interviewed on the subject a Welshman who had been in "the Company's" employ for many years. He is a prominent member of the Welsh church of the town where he lived. By total abstinence and thrift he is enabled to live in greater comfort than the majority of the strikers. He is a staunch Union man, but in no sense an agitator. What follows is a brief summary of what he told me:

Every miner has an assistant apprentice, who is known in mining parlance as his "laborer." It is the "laborer's" business to load the coal in the cars after the miner has blasted and dug it out of the rock. For every car of coal the Company pays the miner about $1.05 (the price varies slightly in different mines). From this amount 40 cents a car is deducted as pay for his laborer. The miner must also provide his own blasting powder, which costs him about 75 cents a day, and he must keep his tools oiled and in repair at an expense of about 25 cents a day. Six cars a day or a "shift" is about the maximum an average miner and his laborer can load in a day. Therefore the Company's presentment of what the miner earns in ten hours is something like this:

|---|--------|
| 6 cars at $1.05 each..... | $6.30 |
| Less laborer's wages for 6 cars at 40 cents each..... | 2.40 |
| Less blasting powder..... | .75 |
| Less tool repairs and sundries..... | .25 |
| | 3.40 |

Balance, the miner's day's pay..... $2.90

"The hands" have no right to complain, says the Company. $2.90 per day is more pay than mechanics in most trades receive. But the miner tells a different story. He asserts that because he has to spend so much time in building props and in working in "thin veins" and because cars are not given to him as fast as he can dig out the coal, he can not and does not load more than three cars a day, so that $2.90 must be cut in two before it can be a true statement of what he actually receives for his day's work. $1.45 for ten hours underground is the miner's version.

And the miner adds a supplementary chapter to his story of his wages. He says he receives $1.45 a day for only about 200 days in the year. On the remaining 165 he is idle.

When coal "goes up" the retailer invariably explains that there is a "shortage of coal at the mine," and that the price has risen in proportion as the supply has diminished. Now, the miner says that from natural causes a "shortage of coal" is almost impossible. The coal is just where it has always been; the mine is there, and the miner. The conditions of supply have not altered. The Company makes the "shortage" to put up the price of coal.

On reporting at the cage on a morning, in the fall or winter, when the consumption of coal all over the country is greatest, the miner will be told that he is "laid off" for three or four days. It is not at all unusual for a colliery to shut down for a week, without any apparent cause.

In another letter I shall present the actual conditions as to religious privileges among the miners, and regarding that crying evil of the Anthracite, child-labor at the mines and in the factories.

FRANCIS H. NICHOLS.

FIFTY YEARS IN CHRIST'S SERVICE

SUNDAY evening, July 20, marked the completion of a rounded half hundred years of active Christian service on the part of Stephen Merritt, the well-known preacher, philanthropist and founder of many charities. It was a milestone of so much importance in the life of the veteran worker, and one that recalled such a multitude of pleasing memories, that many of his friends in New York and elsewhere (numbers of whom had been led to Christ under his ministry), joined heartily with him in a commemorative service.

Few men in active Christian work are more widely known than Mr. Merritt, who has at different times conducted evangelistic services in almost every important centre from the East to the Pacific, and from the Lakes to the Gulf. His life-history is a remarkable one. He was born on March 6, 1833, in New York City. Both parents were Methodists. Stephen joined the Church when nineteen, and entered at once into active Christian relations, as a worker in Bedford Street M. E. Church. He was ordained local deacon by Bishop Scott, about thirty-six years ago, and then local elder by Bishop Ames. He went out from Bedford Street and established the Bank Street Church, of which the Perry Street Church was an offshoot. After holding a number of charges in different parts of the State, he went to Franklin Street M. E. Church, N. Y., as pastor, where he stayed seven years. From that busy field he went to Jane Street M. E. Church, where he worked and preached for five years, building up the largest Methodist Church in New York City at that time, with nearly 1,000 members. During five years, ten thousand souls were converted.

Mr. Merritt organized and conducted an All-night Mission for the Homeless, at the corner of Eighteenth street and Eighth avenue. He also established missions in Little Twelfth street, Roosevelt street, and Horatio street, "Travelers' Club" on Eighth avenue, a mission for homeless, unemployed men, which, in its time, fed and sheltered thousands and turned many to better lives. One of the converts of this mission was John G. Woolley, the well-known temperance orator.

Mr. Merritt's reminiscences of the spiritual experiences of half a century of active Christian service, are such as will encourage and uplift others. He says:

Fifty beautiful years—constantly increasing in joy and strength, as they have rolled off, one by one. A semi-centennial of sweet service! In my early childhood, I gave, again and again, my heart to the Lord, and was precocious in my simple Christian experience. I ran well for a season, but soon ran out. I became disgusted with myself and others, and gave free rein to passions and appetites and went headlong into the folly of sin.

Some years rolled away. I had lost all thought and fear of God, and had plunged my entire household in deep distress on account of my waywardness; but at the time when

STEPHEN MERRITT'S SEMI-CENTENNIAL OF CHRISTIAN WORK FITLY COMMEMORATED

I was deepest in guilt, the Holy Spirit convicted me of sin, convinced me of righteousness and of judgment to come. Transformed anew and fully restored, I entered tremblingly on my life-work in the service of the Lord.

What a struggle it was the first year! How feeble I was; how frequently I fell; what a conflict I had! Toward its close, strength was imparted and faith was increased. My entire life underwent a change. I was owned of God in the conversion of many and became established in the things of God. I felt my need of an education, and in answer to prayer, the Lord sent David Gould, who generously offered to put me through Amenia Seminary and Wesleyan University, at his own expense, which offer I accepted with gratitude and joy. During vacation, on examining the affairs of my father's business, I found him deeply involved and unable to extricate himself. It seemed to my mother, and, very reluctantly, to myself, that my duty was to forego the opportunity of securing a college education, and to take up a business which I disliked, but as duty said "Go," I obeyed. That was the turning-point in my life.

Many years after, in the vestry of Bromfield Street Church in Boston, the Rev. Charles S. Rogers, D.D., the Presiding Elder of the Boston District of the New England Conference (who was my chum at Amenia, and who accepted the offer that had been made to me), on the suggestion, "Let us match lives, peremptorily refused, saying, "Where I have given a dollar, you have given $1,000, and where I have brought one to Christ you have a thousand."

Kaleidoscopic years, with every turn revealing something new and increasingly beautiful and delightful, have been these fifty twelvemonths. Seeking first the Kingdom of God and its righteousness, truly I can say, "all these things have been added." I have been pastor of more than a dozen churches; have built several, and under my ministry thousands have sought and found the Lord. Never has a cent of salary been paid to me, but my business has supplied $100,000 for Christian work in these five decades.

My recommendation to each and all is, Start at once in wisdom's ways; accept Christ as your Saviour and the Holy Spirit as your teacher, comforter and guide. Eight of my old companions continued in the way of sin; all are dead, their lives failures, and they died without God and without hope. Divine grace alone preserved me from a similar fate. These fifty years have proved to me that His yoke is easy, His burden light, and that all His ways are pleasantness and His paths are peace. My life text has been, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee."

Dr. Talmage's Philanthropies

SOME of our newspaper contemporaries, in passing comment upon the life and influence of the late Dr. Talmage, have expressed varying opinions regarding his course in not bequeathing any part of his estate to be applied after his death to benevolent purposes.

To those who knew Dr. Talmage best, there is no mystery about the matter. They were familiar with his habit of "doing things" while he lived, instead of waiting to do them by proxy through executors. They knew his impulsive nature, his readiness to promote any good work with which he came into personal contact. Few men, even in the pulpit, had more avenues of benevolence than he. In New York, he was the warm patron and generous supporter of the Bowery Mission, of which he was an incorporator and director. The Central Union Mission of Washington could testify to his liberality in many an emergency, and so also could our Children's Home and the Bethesda Home. Private charity found him ever sympathetic, for the great preacher had a heart as tender as that of a woman, and could not resist the appeal of suffering. In the large field of public benevolence, he was always one of the first to come to the front. When the Russian peasants were starving in 1892, Dr. Talmage gave the first liberal contribution which started one of the greatest relief movements this country, till then, had ever known. He advocated the cause in pulpit and press. He went to Chicago and bought flour for the sufferers on the Corn exchange. He chartered a steamer, loaded it with gifts, and then, at his own expense, along with Dr. Klopsch, he preceded it to Russia, and personally aided in the distribution. When the farmers of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado were suffering through numerous droughts, it was Talmage who contributed the first $100, and who gave life and impulse to the movement that sent train-loads of food and clothing to the afflicted States. The Governors of those States and the Relief Committees at Topeka and Lincoln, could tell of the splendid results of his labors at that time. When Galveston was flood-swept, he was again among the first to the rescue, cabling his contribution from Europe, where he was then journeying. When Armenia needed our help, the relief work, in which he led, saved thousands of lives. When the Cuban reconcentrados—in those terrible months immediately preceding the Spanish-American war—were dying of hunger, Talmage's purse and pen were again the first in commission. He worked day and night for the cause in Washington, interesting President McKinley and other high officials. Everybody knows the result. When famine-stricken India held out its hands in supplication, it was Talmage who drew the first check that led the memorable relief movement which raised nearly a million from Christian America. It was his influence that enlisted the ablest missionaries in India, under good Bishop Thoburn, in the most gigantic relief work any nation has ever undertaken. He it was who, laying all other business aside, devoted himself to the task of inducing our Government to charter a ship to carry America's gift of bread to the famine-smitten; and not content with one ship-load, he toured the States, pleading India's cause with such eloquence, that a second steamer was loaded with breadstuffs and medicines, and sent off to supplement the first.

We might continue the list, and tell of his labors for the India orphans, for the China flood sufferers, for the poor of New York in the calamitous winter of 1893-94, and other enterprises of the same character, in all of which he not only gave his money, but his unstinted time and toil. We might tell of his repeated waivers of his salary, during his Brooklyn pastorate, when, for the sake of his church, he willingly gave up thousands of dollars, fairly earned. We might even mention his contribution of $10,000 toward the finances of his embarrassed church, but we have said enough. It is not too liberal an estimate to say, that to the various causes he has helped in his life-time, he contributed perhaps as much as his estate finally amounted to. To estimate the value of the labor he gave so willingly to these causes, would be well-nigh impossible.

It was a fixed principle with Dr. Talmage that a man should do all the good he can in his own lifetime, as opportunities arise. He advocated this, and lived up to it, faithfully and consistently. And if he left no instructions to make further and post-mortem contributions for benevolent purposes, it was probably because he felt satisfied that he had given so liberally during his life-time, that he could not consistently further cut down the estate to which he felt his widow and his five children were justly entitled.

Church Federation

IT is gratifying to learn that the movement for the federation of churches is making progress. The report published recently in this journal from the pen of Dr. E. B. Sanford, showed that the scheme is finding favor in our large cities, and this fact will surely influence the rural districts. It would be accepted still more widely if it was better understood. There is a natural fear that it tends to the obliteration of denominational lines. Men and women who have been brought up in the Baptist, Methodist, or Presbyterian Church have a natural affection and heartfelt loyalty to the church of their fathers, and though they would be heartily glad to receive into brotherhood the members of some other church, they would never consent to give up their own denomination and merge it in another. No such proposal is contemplated by the promoters of the federation. The object for which they are working is co-operation, not organic union. They desire to have representatives of the several denominations meet in conference so that they may consult together on matters of common interest, and work together for the extension of Christ's kingdom, in which all are concerned.

Instances there are in which a district needs to be evangelized, yet no one church is able to take the work in hand. Each church has all it can do to meet the expenses of the church, and pay the pastor a living salary; but if these churches were acting in unison, through a regularly organized board, a small contribution from each would suffice to send a missionary into the needy district. Matters of legislation affecting the interests of religion might also be taken into consideration. The protest of one church might be ignored in the State Legislature; but if all the churches were a unit in opposing some mischievous bill, the protest would be heeded. Federation is simply a bringing together as comrades, men who have hitherto acted as rivals and competitors, and welding into a compact army, under the banner of Christ, the denominational regiments, who, in spite of minor differences, are one in loyalty to him.

Christ's Human Sympathy

TO every sorrowing soul, to all men and women burdened with heavy tasks, unwelcome duties, pains and griefs of mind or heart, of physical life or of circumstances, belongs the comfort: "He knows because he has felt it," and in the Man Jesus they are sure of finding not only the pity of a God, but the sympathy of a human heart.

A gentle-souled woman, with a face transfigured with the kindness of her heart, called one day at a public poorhouse to see a little orphaned girl, that had been placed there. She took with her a present for the child, but before giving it she asked:

"Now, dear, what would you like best?" referring, of course, to the present she had brought. The little one looked up wistfully, and shyly answered:

"I'd like—to sit on your lap for a minute—like I was your own little girl."

What the child's heart yearned for in its loneliness and sorrow, though she could not have told it in words, was human sympathy, human arms of love around her, just to be somebody's own. And this is the sweetness and power of Jesus as our comforter and helper. He does not only come as God to lift us and hold us up by his might, but you feel when he has come that you are "as one whom his mother comforteth."

—EIGHTY THOUSAND worshipers is the estimate of attendance at the eleven religious services arranged by pastor S. Edward Young, of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., Sabbath, July 13, and addressed by the leading pastors of all denominations. The parks of the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny and of the Traction Company were entirely given over to the meetings.

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOLS

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:—I have before me a report of the closing night of the Annual Convention of the National Educational Association, recently held at Minneapolis, Minn. About 20,000 teachers were in the city during the Convention. Addresses were made by distinguished educators, and the "National Federation of Teachers" was organized. 8,000 people attended the closing meeting, and listened to two able addresses.

One of the papers before the Association was that of President Butler of Columbia University, a strong paper on "Some Pressing Problems in Education." He advocated the general restoration of the Bible in our Public Schools. His appeal was interrupted by frequent and tremendous applause, showing that his views met with the approval of his great audience of about 3,000. He said:

I am not talking about the Bible now in the sense of using it for religious instruction or for the promotion of theology. My thesis is that the neglect of the Bible, caused by sectarianism, has incapacitated the rising generation from knowing the beauties of the greater writers in the English language, from Chaucer to Browning. Without a knowledge of the Bible, one can not read and understand the glories of Milton and Shakespeare and Tennyson. I read the first twelve lines in Paradise Lost to a group of college students one day, and none of them could understand the references to Bible history.

But I wish especially to call the attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to the seventh and eighth resolutions adopted by the Convention, which should be a cause for rejoicing on the part of all Christian people. The resolutions are:

Seventh. We regard true education as inseparable from morality; and believe the public school the recognized agency to make the relation binding. We urge all public school authorities of the country, teachers and parents, to give strict attention to moral instruction in our schools, as the true foundation of character and good citizenship. Every consideration of good public policy and healthful social condition point to the necessity of such instruction.

Eighth. It is apparent that familiarity with the English Bible as a masterpiece of literature, is rapidly decreasing among the pupils in our schools. This is a direct result of a conception which regards the Bible as a theological book merely, and thereby tends to its exclusion from the schools of some States as a subject of reading and study. We hope, and ask for, such a change of public sentiment in this regard as will permit and encourage the English Bible, now honored by name in many school laws and State constitutions, to be read and studied as a literary work of the highest and purest type, side by side with the poetry and prose which it has improved, and in large part formed.

One of the greatest obstacles to Christian progress, in the past and to-day, has been and is the refusal of school boards to have any Bible instruction or morality taught in our public schools. While crammed with all sorts of other kinds of knowledge, they have come out of the schools agnostics and materialists. Every Christian should use voice, vote and influence to have the Bible taught in every public school, or at least to have charts of the commandments of God—the Decalogue—displayed on every school-room wall, so that each student, old and young, may be kept posted on the knowledge of right from wrong.

Thus we may advance the cause and establish the principles of civic righteousness in every part of this our great and grand republic.

Among the Workers

—THE REV. E. P. HAMMOND, whose work on child conversion is widely known, is conducting special services at West Creek, N. J. Three towns, connected by trolley, are interested in these meetings.

—THE ENTIRE New Testament has been translated into Sheetowa by Rev. Erwin H. Richards, of the Inhambane (S. A.) Mission, and will soon be printed.

—ALEXANDER SKELLIE, evangelist, is this summer conducting a series of meetings in the Adirondack region, in sections seldom reached. He proposes to hold services at fourteen localities in succession, prosecuting the work through August and September. Excellent results are already noticeable.

—ELMER E. HUBBARD, founder of the Cuban Orphan Industrial School at Cardenas, writes, acknowledging receipt of a check for $10 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and says: "The money was needed at once to help purchase our supply of food for the next ten days." The Cardenas Home has experienced many vicissitudes. It has forty-nine little orphan inmates at present.

—THE TORONTO Bible Training School, of which Rev. Dr. Elmore Harris is president, has recently closed its eighth session. Fifty of its graduates are missionaries in foreign lands; two lost their lives in the massacres in China, and two have returned home. The others are now preaching in Turkey in Europe, Armenia, India, China, Japan, Central and Eastern Africa, South America, and among the American Indians.

Tribute to a Hero

DURING the stay in London of the visitors from India who went to attend the Coronation, and are waiting for the deferred ceremony, they have been conducted around the city, to see its most notable spectacles. It has been interesting, says an American correspondent, to watch these stalwart Orientals and to notice the character of the objects which impressed them most. Many of them have never been out of India before, and therefore European civilization is entirely new to them, but their interest is discriminating. They take little interest in the Houses of Parliament and other famous buildings, which the Londoner thinks will be sure to astonish the foreigner. Their own temples far surpass in architectural beauty anything the modern city has to show. Neither are they impressed by the money and bullion in the vaults of the Bank of England, which are a cause of amazement to most visitors. Other spectacles which usually impress the foreigner they gaze on with stolidity. But it has been remarked that when they were taken to St. Paul's Cathedral, every party became deeply interested in the tombs and monuments. Westminster Abbey being closed at present, there is no building besides, containing the tombs of so many famous men as St. Paul's. The burial places of the Duke of Wellington and of Nelson and of Lord Napier especially attract their attention. But it is the monument to Gen. Gordon that they all wish to see. When it is pointed out to them each man spontaneously makes a reverent salutation. Evidently his was a character that they admire. It is singular that it should be so, for Gen. Gordon was above all things a Christian, while they are Hindoos, Mohammedans, or Buddhists. But whatsoever their creed, they pay this tribute of respect to the devoted hero. It is a significant act, showing how a consistent Christian may win the respect of men of other nationalities and other creeds.

Blessings are upon the head of the just, . . . the memory of the just is blessed (Prov. 10:6, 7).

Perpetual Light

News comes from Berlin that a new metal has been discovered by Prof. Marckwald, of the University of that city. He reports that he has found in a block of uranium a metal hitherto unknown to science. It is extremely rare, not more than one grain of it being contained in a ton of uranium ore. Its significance consists in the singular fact that it gives out light without heat, and without any appreciable waste of its substance. In this it differs from Prof. McKissick's discovery of 1896, that ordinary brown sugar emitted rays of light. The sugar simply emitted in the dark, light that it had stored in the sunlight. The new metal, on the other hand, appears to possess light as a permanent quality. The discovery is expected to aid in the solution of the problem of phosphorescence in animals and vegetables, besides the practical benefit if any way is found of utilizing it so that the world may have artificial light which does not come from oil, gas or dynamo. The value of such a light-giver can be readily perceived, yet the spiritual light which God gives without limit is too often rejected.

That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (John 1:9).

A Disastrous Handshake

A press dispatch from Des Moines, Ia., describes a singular accident which has befallen a prominent politician of that city. In the course of his canvass of the constituency he met an old acquaintance, whom he had not seen for some years. He put out his hand to shake hands with him, and the other, overjoyed at the meeting, grasped it effusively. So strong a grip did he give, that the politician's hand seemed to be crushed in the grip of the other. He thought the pain in it would soon pass away, but it grew so much worse that he consulted his physician about it. After examining it, the doctor told him that several small bones were broken and that he must have them set. The operation was a painful one, but it was bravely borne and the patient supposed a few days would see it right. The pain, however, grew worse and it is now found that a cancerous growth has developed. It will be necessary to amputate the hand. How sorry his friend must be to have done him so grievous an injury! Better that he had met an enemy that morning than one whose regard was evinced in so injurious a way. Unhappily, moral injury, too, comes more frequently from friends than enemies, though often it is not intentionally done.

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners (Ps. 1:1).

Death of John W. Mackay

Widespread regret was caused by a cable dispatch from London on July 21, saying that the great capitalist and enterprise business man whose name was famous the world over, was dead. It was not known among his friends here that he was ill, and even his family had not been alarmed about his condition until the day before he died. He went to London to arrange for the laying of a cable to the Philippine Islands, and his scheme was approaching success when he was prostrated by congestion of the lungs and brain, which proved fatal. He was seventy-one years of age, but had the appearance and vitality of a much younger man. He was a native of Ireland, but came to New York in his childhood. As a boy, he sold newspapers on the sidewalk, and afterwards became clerk to a shipbuilder. He wandered West at the first opportunity, but for some time had to endure severe hardships. Time and again, he invested his savings in mining, only to lose them all. At last, however, he and two partners gained possession of a claim that was said to be exhausted. Mackay, however, had faith in it, and clung to it after his partners had lost hope. It was the famous Bonanza Mine, from which more than a hundred million dollars was ultimately taken. It was reported that from this and other mining properties, Mr. Mackay derived an income for a long time of $800,000 a month. He was, however, chiefly famous as the man who, in conjunction with Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, broke the monopoly of the telegraph cable search, in identifying a patient who died in the Good Samaritan Hospital in that city. The man was well known in Los Angeles by the name of Charles Hill. He was reputed to have made a large fortune during the Civil War through army contracts, but as he lived entirely alone and was very eccentric, no one knew the value of his property. After his death, however, an investigation was made, which revealed property worth $150,000. There were no claimants for it, there was no will, and for nearly two months there was no clue to his identity. In making a closer examination of the man's effects, however, the Public Administrator found an old Bible, on the fly-leaf of which several entries of births and marriages were made in faded ink. The name of Charles Hill was not among them, but there was another name, which appeared from its position to be the real name of the deceased, and coupled with it was mention of a town in Massachusetts. The Public Administrator visited the town, and, without telling his business, learned that a person of that name had disappeared before the War and had never been heard of since. His relatives were still living there, and among them are eight who are entitled to divide the estate among them. The fly-leaf of a Bible was a strange place in which to find a clue to a man's identity. If the information sought had been his spiritual identity, plenty of clues might be found in other parts of the book. Many men do not know themselves, nor where they stand, until they have studied its pages.

Thou sayest I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and poor, and blind, and naked (Rev. 3:17)

BRIEF NOTES

The death is announced at Ipswich of Miss Butler, said to be a lineal descendant of Oliver Cromwell through the Protector's third son, Henry.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan's Summer Bible School at Northfield, Mass., has attracted a very large number of students. It promises to be a most successful feature of the Northfield work.

The Rev. Jonathan Lees, of China, has recently died, after having been a most valued missionary since 1861. He prepared a hymnal for the Chinese Christians, which was largely used, and also trained native evangelists.

We deeply regret to hear of the death of President Reade, of the Taylor University, Indiana. He was a most devoted and untiring friend of the institution, and had a large share in bringing it to its present successful eminence.

A singular innovation in religious services was witnessed in the Lexington Avenue Baptist Church, New York, on July 13, when a lady gave a whistling solo. It was given while the collection was being taken up. At the close of the service the same lady gave a whistling imitation of the mocking bird.

The Wesleyan Methodists of Great Britain have purchased a magnificent site in London near Westminster Abbey, on which they will erect a great hall as the "Headquarters of Universal Methodism." The land cost $1,650,000. It was paid out of the fund of a million guineas raised as the Twentieth Century Fund.

A Godspeed service was given last week to twenty missionaries of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who are sailing for their spheres of labor. Five go to Alaska, seven to China, four to Japan and four to the Philippines. Bishop Burgess and Dr. Paddock gave them addresses and besought God's protection and blessing upon them.

From the columns of our neighbor, Christian Work, we learn that the venerable journal, The Evangelist, well known to the Christian public of America for three-quarters of a century, has been amalgamated with it. Dr. Hallock is to be congratulated on acquiring the famous journal, which will in future be incorporated with his own.

Rev. Thomas J. Morgan, for several years the efficient secretary of the Baptist Home Missionary Society, died July 13 at Yonkers, N. Y., aged sixty-two years. Dr. Morgan made an honorable record as a soldier in the Civil War, rising from the position of a private to the rank of colonel in the 14th Colored United States Infantry, and of brevet-brigadier-general of United States Volunteers. He was Commissioner of Indian Affairs under President Harrison's Administration, and in many ways has spent his life effectively in Christian public service.

lines across the Atlantic. They laid a new submarine cable, thus placing the whole business world under obligation. There are many who envy the man who has wealth so vast as Mr. Mackay had, but as the Preacher pointed out centuries ago, there is a treasure that is far more valuable.

Wisdom is a defence, even as money is a defence; but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom preserveth the life of him that hath it (Eccles. 7:12).

Heirs Traced through a Bible

The Public Administrator of Los Angeles, Cal., has succeeded, after two months'

KANKAKEE'S REVIVAL YEAR

PROF. MONTGOMERY, SINGING EVANGELIST

ONE of the peculiar fields for church work in the State of Illinois is Kankakee, fifty-five miles south of Chicago, on the Illinois Central Railroad, with a population of 15,000 or more. It is one of the old French towns of the State, and is more generally known as one of the fields of Father Chiniqy, who lately died in Canada. In the city are four catholic churches, the French church claiming a membership of 3,000. There are, besides, five Protestant German churches, using the German language alone. This predominating foreign influence has seemed to make impossible a vigorous, spiritual "forward movement" among Protestants. A number of efforts have been made, under the leadership of some of the foremost men in the evangelistic work, but seldom with marked success.

On Jan. 1 of this year, the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, the Rev. Augustus Marshall Ayers, sent out a pastoral letter to his people, urging them to co-operate with him in an effort to bring fifty persons into fellowship with the church by the next communion, March 2, and asking all who would to sign the addressed postal card and return it.

Some forty persons, out of a membership of nearly three hundred, signed the card, and without special meetings, other than one week of preparatory services for the communion, exactly forty persons were received into the church at the time appointed. By the middle of the next week twenty-four more were received. It was then decided to employ an evangelist, and Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman recommended Rev. E. J. Bulgin and his singer, Prof. Montgomery. Dr. Bulgin is a typical mountaineer, from North Carolina, six feet two inches and a half in height, slim, with dark hair, looking not unlike Abraham Lincoln, and with a splendid voice. His message appeals to men, and is directed, not to their emotions so much as to their reason and common sense. The number of men who were reached at the meetings is a demonstration of this power. Mr. Bulgin's sermons are illustrated, not from books, but from life in the mountains of the South, and they are charged with the ozone of the hills.

As a result of three weeks' efforts, sixty-seven others were received into the church, and a number into the other churches of the city, making 131 additions to the First Presbyterian Church alone since the beginning of the revival. The effect upon the church is remarkable.

Two months have passed away, and there is no diminution of the spiritual activity; the prayer-meeting attendances average one hundred, the regular Sunday services are full, and the income of the church has increased one-third.

There is a very visible deepening of the spiritual life of the church, and its members, as a body, are living closer to God than ever before in their church experience.

Dr. Bulgin, who lives at 506 LaSalle avenue, Chicago, is now spending his few weeks of vacation in his old cabin home in the state of North Carolina with his aged parents.

LITTLE MOTHERS AT MONT-LAWN

ANOTHER company of "Little Mothers" recently went up to Mont-Lawn, anticipating a delightful time there. No children are more welcome guests at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home than the "little mothers"; none are needier or worthier. The "little mothers," as our readers know, are very young children who care for smaller brothers and sisters, filling to these the place of mother.

"Little mothers" sew, and wash, and iron, and cook, for the little ones looking to them for such care. The real mother may be an invalid in a hospital; or she may have passed away; or she may be a scrub-woman, or a laundress, or cook, whose labors to make money for bread and shelter take her daily from the tenement room, where her little brood is left in the care of the faithful elder daughter, who supplies her place in her absence. There are "little fathers," too, at Mont-Lawn; small boys watching over tiny brothers and sisters with feminine tenderness, and with wisdom passing their years.

It must be a great pleasure to little people who work all the time at home bearing these heavy responsibilities and wearying cares, to have a long glad holiday at a beautiful place where everything is done for them. No sweeping and scrubbing and dish-washing for the little sweepers and scrubbers and dish-washers; no cooking for little cooks, and no heart sick wondering where materials for the next meal is to come from. Tables are set, food is provided, garments are given as if by magic; and when night comes, downy beds invite refreshing slumber. Over many a snowy cot appears a tablet bearing such pretty inscriptions as, "Thank-offering Cot," "Daisy Cot,"

A LITTLE MOTHER AND HER FAMILY

"Grandpa Plummer's Cot," followed by lines revealing perhaps the name of some big-hearted man or woman far away, who generously remembered the little tenement children of this big city. It costs $21 to sustain a cot for seventy days, and that contribution gives seven children an outing. Some friends, whom God hath blessed with abundance, want to do even more; and so they send $36 and say, "Give a dozen children an outing in my name." A few have sent larger colonies. Many have given the ever-blessed "widow's mite," and sent just one child. It costs only $3 to give one waif a ten-days' outing at Mont-Lawn: $6 sends two, $9 three, $12 four, $15 five, and so on. Will you help us make the children of the poor happy? Gifts of money should be sent to this paper; of garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

Converted in Prison

S. J. H., of Oquawka, Ill., a reader of this journal, writes as follows:

I thank you for those twelve beautiful pictures you sent me free. I would not take a dollar and a half for the pictures, to say nothing about the paper. On June 28th I was arrested and lodged a prisoner in jail. Another prisoner had a bundle of CHRISTIAN HERALDS sent to him from a friend in Oregon. Through hearing those papers read, and through reading them myself, I awoke to the truth of the Gospel in Christ, and, by his help, I am determined to be a better man. I will be tried next October, and whether I go free or to the penitentiary, I hope to go a saved man. May God continue to bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the great work it is doing, is my earnest prayer.

Exercise 47

1. One kind of thrift is that of not spending money on that which is not needed; by this means an amount is kept ready for any needs that arise. 2. The thrifty man differs from the miser, for the one husband's resources so that he may spend in the best method he can, while the other is a wretched fellow who covets and hoards riches, so that he may gloat over his wealth. 3. Money gained by honest means, and saved without stinting those who may depend on the earner, or niggardly refusing to give that which is claimed by society, is wealth earned and added to one's resources. 4. Both the progressionist and the protectionist assent to this. 5. We shall not be so impertinent as to assert that certain views on current events prevent any man who has studied the fortunes of his fellow men from feeling sympathetically disposed toward their efforts to make good use of funds obtained by skilled labor. 6. But without a secure State a man might be robbed of his goods, and to have such a State all must pay their part. 7. It was in

REVIEW.

1. What description of consonants are halved for t only, and what for d only? 2. How is a vowel read before a half-sized consonant? How after? 3. What may a consonant hooked finally, and words of more than one syllable, be halved to express? 4. How is the addition of t and d to m, n, l, r, represented? 5. When are the halved forms ld and rd not employed? 6. How is lt usually written, and what are the exceptions? 7. What are the limitations to the halving of mp and ng? 8. When should the half-length upward rt not be used, and when is it usually employed? 9. Under what circumstances must a full size and a half size consonant not be joined? 10. Illustrate the rule by writing cooked, midnight, fact.

The student should read as much shorthand as possible, for practice in reading is second only in importance to practice in writing shorthand. It is in this respect that the student of the Isaac Pitman system has so great an advantage over writers of other systems, there being more shorthand literature in the Isaac Pitman system than will be found in all others combined.

The intelligent reading of well-written shorthand is to the brain of the thorough student, what the landscape is to the artist. For this purpose the student is recommended to purchase Esop's Fables or Esop's Readings, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand. Either of these works will be sent postpaid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XVII., will appear in the issue of August 20.

HOME THOUGHTS IN THE PORCH

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Ideal Character

DRIVING over a beautiful country road one day last week, I saw a stone wall that skirted a sweep of meadow land. The wall was roughly built and very strong. It looked as if it could guard the boundary line of the farm for a great many years, if need be. But festooning it were vines clinging and draping its gray, irregular surface, and thickly blooming on the top, making a blaze of orange and yellow, were endless bowering nasturtiums.

The picture made by wall and flowers gave me a very beautiful conception of what character should be. Like the stone wall, character is built a little at a time. It should be strong, fixed, bulwarked by uncompromising devotion to principle. Heaven pity the man who has no convictions. "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel," or "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting," shall be written of such an one. We must have convictions. Let us get that point clearly stated. We cannot be fluid—waving, driven of the wind and tossed. In the old days of the Civil War, a brave Confederate general, who was of the Cromwellian type of piety and courage, a man whom North and South to-day revere, was fighting as he prayed, for a losing cause. "There is Jackson, standing like a stone-wall," cried somebody, and the soubriquet stuck. Stonewall Jackson he remains to this day in memory. We must have the stone-wall's fixity of purpose, the stone-wall's basis of strength. But we need not be wholly grim and gaunt and unadorned. Flowers of charity, of gentleness, of considerateness, of tenderness, may soften our harsh outlines, and decorate our lives. When in a character there is a blending of strength and gentleness, the character becomes ideal. Does not the psalm say of our Father, and to him, "Thy gentleness hath made me great"?

In home ordering we most of all need this matchless mingling of sweetness and strength. We most of all require in the household life that underlying it shall be justice, a rock foundation. Above that we may build the beautiful edifice and wreath upon it our fair garlands. In little places where the soil drifts and the sunshine falls, flowers will spring, and the home shall be fragrant, and the life well nigh divine, because in it peace reigns, harmony dwells, and Christ forever rules.

The Woman's National Sabbath Alliance

Very quietly, with no flourish of trumpets, but very persistently, with a definite purpose in view, the Woman's National Sabbath Alliance is doing its work of preserving intact the Lord's Day, as our fathers kept it. "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy," is the never abrogated command of Jehovah. No modern improvements can smirch its brightness; no modern sophistries explain away the obligation to obey it. Women, as chief arbiters of home life, queens regnant of the household, are the ones to see that a right popular sentiment and a wholesome moral atmosphere obtain in our land. The Alliance is influential, vigorous, and growing in numbers, having local associations at work in almost every State in the Union.

Leaving Pets

In leaving pets at home, when going away for the summer, the part of true kindness is to make due provision for their care. A cat accustomed to the shelter of its home, to food and drink at intervals, and to a soft bed at night, is the most forlorn of living creatures when the family go away, leaving it to forage for itself, and to become that dreaded being, a tramp cat. Pussy is naturally dainty and delicate; it is far kinder to put her tenderly to sleep with chloroform, than to desert her for a term of weeks, during which she may be starved, chased, and beaten, and lose her beauty and good temper. "Nobody's dog" is a synonym for misery, because the dog is so companionable and so devoted to his master, that when he wanders, masterless and aloof, he is wretched beyond expression. Little wonder if, from sheer heartache, such a dog goes mad. And, how contemptible is the spirit that neglects birds, or any other little home pets, when a little forethought would provide them with homes and care during absence.

An Old Settler

At the age of eighty-three, died one of our readers, Mr. Lewis W. Larsh, for forty-five years a resident of Des Moines, Ia.: "In the spring of 1856 (having married Mary Tackett in Indiana in 1840), he drove into Fort Des Moines with his family in an old-fashioned covered wagon or prairie schooner." Mr. Larsh did not amass a great fortune, he spent his long life in honor and integrity, beloved by all his neighbors, and rearing in the fear and love of God, nine sons and three daughters, all of whom grew to maturity. He is survived by a widow, eight children, forty grandchildren and six great-grandchildren, a typical pioneer's record. Two years ago,

A SONG OF SUMMER

"It's Heigh-ho for Summer, the days are so long,
For Summer and flowers, for mirth and for song."

his daughter Minda, Mrs. Lamb, of Leadville, Colo., sent her old father a poetical birthday tribute, in reply to a ten-page letter written to her with his own hand. We have room for only a stanza:

As you, our wrongs and crosses, we'll meekly, bravely bear,
Leaving to God the sinner, and our every earthly care.

Letting Alone

Often a mother must stand aside and let her children alone to work out their own problems. But to a certain extent she is responsible for them and cannot evade her responsibility. No mother should allow her daughter to drift into an undesirable friendship which may ripen into love, and may affect an entire life, or two lives. Not by antagonism, but by subtle and tactful influencing, the mother should, so to speak, shape her daughter's love affairs.

Mere letting alone is like mere sitting still. It may mean shipwreck. It may mean ruin. It may mean death. Interference is sometimes injudicious, but letting alone is disastrous. The true safeguard is found in that sweet confidence between mother and daughter which makes them sharers of each other's thoughts, and renders secrets between them impossible.

Each Day God's Day

What dignity and beauty would be given to our lives if we would but take each day as God's day. Rising in the morning, how sweet to remember that here is a new gift from our Father, here a new occasion for service, and that God has a plan for us in this day, that he has sent us straight from the sky.

A Trousseau for Ten Dollars

A LITTLE yellow-covered pamphlet, the paper just the tint of the jonquils on my table, drifted into my hands the other day. It proved to be a report to the subscribers to the Cuban Orphanage work of Mr. Elmer E. Hubbard, at Matanzas, and was especially interesting to them of course; but I found it absorbing enough to wish to pass it on to you. The Business Men's Class of the First Congregational Church of Detroit have printed and published this booklet. One of the first things to arrest my attention was the announcement of a wedding, such affairs having a perennial attraction for every one, since all the world loves a lover. Mr. Hubbard was married on February 16 to Miss Weir, a fellow-worker. In a letter written to a friend during the engagement, Mr. Hubbard frankly stated that they had no money and would have no "wedding garments," except that a friend, who was receiving five dollars a month herself, had given the bride her last ten dollars to buy her trousseau. "But still," wrote the happy man, "I feel sure that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed as she will be. She says I must not plan to take any better care of her than I do of myself, and I am asking God to take better care of her than I could do with all the money in the world, and we believe he will."

All blessing on this pair who start with wedded hands, poor in this world's goods and rich in faith. And do not you want to help them, and aid them in educating the little bright-eyed Cubans, orphaned and destitute, at Cardenas and Matanzas?

Trifles

City people use the telegraph very freely, and think nothing of sending a message by wire when they have not time for a letter. This is all right when they are telegraphing city friends, or village friends who live near a station. In a multitude of instances, though, a telegraphic message costs a sum of fifty cents or a dollar for delivery after it reaches the office nearest its destination. The person receiving it may or may not have this sum to spare. A lady to whom a dollar is a matter of much importance, who does not spend a penny without a good deal of thought, is annoyed when she opens a telegram and finds that a postal card with R. F. D. on it would have fully answered the purpose. We should never take any step without a thought of the party at the other end of the line, whom our action may somewhat affect.

Take another trifle; the fan that you use in church in hot weather. Are you sure that you are not giving neuralgia to the woman in front of you, as you fan yourself in such wise that you send an icy current on the back of her neck? Or, the window you open in the car, oblivious of the person behind you, who gets the cinders, while you get the cool breeze? Or again, when the car is crowded and you calmly retain two seats, having paid for only one, are you behaving quite as the rules of honor and honesty would have you act?

In the simple matter of courtesy, when one in the family is reading a book, and the rest wait their turn, good manners are shown and an illustration of good breeding is given. It is good policy not to overlook the great importance of apparent trifles.

Economy or Extravagance

"What are you doing, Eloise?"
"Darning my stockings. See how beautifully I am doing it. Mother has taught us how to mend, until mending is a real accomplishment."

"Well, for my part, I never waste time on darning. When my stockings wear out, I toss them aside and buy new ones."
"What a ruinous wife you will make for a poor man," said Eloise's mother, who had come in while the girls talked. "Do you know, Madge, that the best thing a young woman can bring her husband is a talent for economy. Should you marry a millionaire, it would still be worth your while to exercise frugality, and save his means so that he could do good. But you and Eloise will probably marry men on salaries, I am afraid your husband will be a sufferer if you keep on in extravagant ways in little things."

Eloise smiled, but was unconvinced. Experience will be her stern teacher one of these days.

is not as harmless as it seems. It brings into the house many undesirable things which it picks up with its hairy cup-shaped feet. Among them are disease germs. After a fly has entered your home it is a menace to your family's health. You should make it harmless. But you cannot do it without which catches the fly and the germs it carries and coats them both over with a varnish from which they can never escape.

Poisoning the fly will not do—as the germ is not poisoned.

A fly trap will not do—as the buzzing of the fly will blow the germs through the meshes and you will inhale them.

So Tanglefoot is the only remedy. Every dealer has it. It is an inexpensive safeguard.

Chapter XXXVIII.

An Hour of Child Study

DURING the course of the next five years Hilda Rossi had ample time to discover that it was no idle whim that had changed the current of her husband's life. She was still ignorant of the true cause which carried him daily further and further away from her. He had now an office somewhere in the city. She had never visited the place. That tremendous activities were centred there she learned by hearsay, and through the constant comments, complimentary and otherwise, of the press.

Her own life had become a round of social functions, which at times failed to interest her. To meet the same people, attired with monotonous splendor, day after day, week after week, and year after year; to hear the same music; to eat the same kinds of salads, ices and sweets; to talk the same unending commonplaces—all this palls even on the least of human souls after a time. A being endowed with the attributes of its Maker must necessarily expand beyond the bounds of a mere butterfly existence either soon or late.

It had come about that Hilda, having gradually mastered her small sins of omission—which indeed were more numerous than her sins of commission, had at last taken rank as a woman of fashion: one who spoke as one having authority on all questions pertaining to society. This much having been accomplished, she found herself as bitterly dissatisfied as ever, and longing for new worlds to conquer like any Alexander. Then it was that she fell to attending lectures and clubs; developed a mania for rare prints; collected butterflies; allowed her name to be added to one or two managerial boards. Later it chanced that she "took up" child-study—a fad of the moment—and straightway discovered in her young son, Armitage, curiously interesting and instructive traits. This brought her a little nearer to the silent, dark man, who seldom talked with her in these days, but sometimes watched her with a strangely sad look in his brown eyes.

More than once she had attempted to break through the wall of mysterious reserve, which strengthened with the years. She learned after a time that any token of affection on her part was the signal for a question on his: "What can I do for you, Hilda?" He seemed to think that even a caress was given to prepare the way for a request. She came at last to hate this question.

The two met one day unexpectedly. Hilda had been reading aloud to her little son—it being a part of the specified course in child-study to classify youthful comments on literature. She was questioning him now with more or less skill on what she had been reading. It chanced to be Kingsley's immortal Water Babies. His replies she jotted down with care in a dainty note-book.

"Now, Armitage," she went on, "why was it that Tom never found a water-baby till after he got the lobster out of the pot?" "You haven't read the story nine times yet, mother," said the little fellow. "It says you must read it nine times before you will find out!"

Hilda gravely set down this answer in her note-book. Then to the child's immense delight she read again the scene where lonely little Tom, in his fruitless search for the water-babies, finds the stupid lobster in the round cage of green wickets.

"I know, I know! without hearing it nine times," cried the lad, his brown eyes shining.

Hilda dropped the book in her lap. "What is it that you know?" she asked. "I know why Tom found the water babies after he helped the lobster."

"Well, why was it?"

"It was just the helping," said the child, nodding his head wisely. "I guess daddy will find the water-babies pretty soon, because he is always helping somebody."

"Who told you that, my child?"

"It was nurse. She says daddy is the best man in the whole world. He helped her brother, who has nine children, when he broke his leg."

Hilda tapped the book thoughtfully with her pencil. "Do you think I shall find any water-babies, Armitage?" she asked.

The child surveyed her keenly. "Are you going to write it down in the book, mother, or do you want to know?" he demanded.

"I want to know, of course," laughed Hilda.

"Well, then, I don't think you will. You don't help daddy. He feels bad sometimes."

"Why do you say that, Armitage?" she murmured, and glanced up to see her husband standing in the doorway.

She colored under the look in his eyes till the tears filled her own. For some unexplained reason she trembled so violently that the pencil dropped from her fingers.

He restored it with a low bow. "You are occupied," he said politely. "I will come some other time."

The boy flung himself upon the retreating figure. "Don't go, daddy," he begged, "we're reading Water Babies. You like Water Babies. Tom has found them at last. I am so glad!"

Immanuel eyed his wife with some astonishment. He had not known her in this role of the devoted mother. He acknowledged that it became her, with a little throb of his heavy heart. "Shall I stay?" he asked her.

"If you like," she said indifferently, but with a curious tremor in her voice. She was wondering if he had heard the child's verdict, and her own question.

"You know the story, of course," she said in a low voice, and plunged at once into the reading. "Now then," they cried all at once, "we must come away home, or the tide will leave us dry. We have mended all the broken sea-weed, and put all the rock-pools in order, and planted all the shells again in the sand, and nobody will see where the ugly storm swept in last week."

"That is just what you do, daddy," said the child gravely, as his mother paused to turn the leaf. "You clear away all the ugly houses, and plant the dirty courts with flowers, and make everything pretty and nice. You ought to see how lovely it is, mother; won't you come with us some day?"

The man flushed a little under her inquiring eyes. "He went with me one day to see the new houses by the river," he said. "You need not fear; I took care that there was no contagion."

She remembered that long ago she had once refused to kiss him because he had just come home from "those horrid slums." "I am not afraid," she said hurriedly.

"And will you come with daddy and me and see how pretty it is now? It used to be ugly and dark, and the children were sick, and some of them died, and the women didn't care about keeping their rooms clean. Now they are all quite happy. I should like to live there; there are so many little boys to play with. Won't you come, mother?"

There was a breathless silence in the room for the space of a minute. Then Immanuel said quietly, "Mother has too many other things to do, lad, she doesn't care for the new houses by the river."

She opened her lips to reply, but he checked her by rising with a glance at his watch. He stooped to kiss the child, then went away without another word.

"Don't you love daddy?" asked the child, laying his small hand timidly on the skirt of her gown.

"What a question!" cried Hilda with an unsteady laugh. "You must go out now with nurse; see, she is all ready for you."

With a sudden impulse she leant down to the child, and pressed her lips to the rosy cheek where a moment before her husband had left a kiss. "Am I falling hopelessly in love with my husband?" she asked herself half angrily, when she had gained the shelter of her own room. For the hundredth time she mused long over the estrangement which had grown up between them in a single day. Then she called her maid somewhat sharply, and made ready to attend a series of receptions.

Chapter XXXIX.

Greater Love Hath no Man

IN his almost single-handed combat with the hydra-headed offspring of public indifference and private greed, Immanuel Rossi had so far gained but little ground. The monster grew horribly fast, stretching its slimy coils along both rivers, penetrating the business centres, thrusting its ugly head into outlying suburban regions, overrunning the carelessly defended districts of the middle classes, and even leering contemptuously at the sacred precincts of the rich. "You do not heed me," it seemed to say; "but I grow while you sleep, and before many years I shall strangle you in a single night."

It was like trying to beat back the waves of the incoming tide, yet he persisted doggedly. City officials first laughed at him, then cursed him savagely, while they heaped up legal obstacles mountain high in the face of his endeavors to mitigate the nameless horrors which beset the poor. Yet he was not altogether friendless. The owner of wealth is perforce respected, and there were those who loved him. The women and children whom he had snatched from the jaws of the monster worshipped him. Some of the men acknowledged that he was doing the best he knew how. They understood better than the women the almost hopeless nature of his task.

His method was simple. He searched for the most congested spots, bought the property where it could be bought, and replaced the filthy old houses with new ones, upon which was expended the best skill purchasable. Crowding there must be; the tenement had come to stay; but between the old tenements and the new was all the difference between comfort and misery. Then came the more difficult task of maintaining the accustomed level of decency among the common crowd which pressed in to take possession.

On the day when he had stumbled upon that innocent little scene in his own nursery, he walked away from the palace which he called home, and struck straight into the region of the monster which was nearest. There were certain terrible old houses here which he had been trying to gain possession of for a year past. The owner was absent on a pleasure trip and declined to part with his treasure, which was indeed bringing him something like forty per cent.

In his visits to this particular plague spot, he had found a young man dying with consumption. It was a common enough case. A bricklayer had moved in from the country with his wife and two children, in the hope of securing steady employment on some of the big buildings going up in that part of town. Being a good workman he had no difficulty in getting work, and for a time all went swimmingly with the young family. Regular wages meant a pleasant spot to live in and plenty to eat. Yet the children grew thin and white on the city milk, and the wife longed for the country garden as she bought the wilted vegetables from the corner grocery.

Then came swift destruction. A heavy cold—or was it the foul dust from a demolished building?—and the slow-approaching death from tuberculosis laid the sole support of the family low. Once entered upon, the old track, worn smooth by the feet of countless thousands, they had sunken swiftly to the level of the submerged.

As Immanuel Rossi picked his way

among overflowing barrels of garbage, which, with the swarming children, filled almost every foot of space, he was thinking of this man. He coupled him in his mind with the complacent theorists who declare that "the condition in which you now find yourself is the best possible condition for your individual development." There were times when this would-be saviour almost doubted the divine co-operation; this was one of them. As he climbed the stairs in the fetid half-darkness to the tune of slamming doors, squeaking pumps and crying children, he wondered dully if God was present, filling the foul air with his fullness, individualizing himself in the gaunt forms which hurried to and fro in the filthy corridors; if here the divine energy was at work carrying these wretched beings on in their appointed cycle of endless existence.

The sick man lay gasping on a low cot by the one window, which gave on an air-shaft less than three feet square.

"How are you to-day, Mr. Stark?" said Immanuel, advancing with a cheerfulness he did not feel.

"He's easier to-day, thank you, sir," said the woman who sat at his side fanning away the flies with a folded newspaper. "He ate a bit of the fruit and things you sent yesterday." She relapsed into silence with that. What, indeed, was there to talk about?

"Have you thought over what I proposed yesterday?" asked Immanuel, after a heavy pause.

"He's too sick to move," said the woman, with an obstinate tightening of her blue lips. "If you'd come two months ago, sir; but now —" She stopped short and redoubled her exertions with the newspaper. "I don't want him took to no hospital, neither," she added, sullenly. "The doctor was for takin' him before, but he don't want to go."

"No, an' I ain't goin'," gasped the man. "I know these 'ere doctors; all they want is a chance to cut you up when you're dead."

"But if you had more air you could breathe better," suggested their visitor rather hopelessly.

"I can't breathe what I've got," snapped the sick man.

"We're very thankful to you, sir, for what you've done," began the woman, turning her sunken eyes upon Immanuel. "He's kin' of short, 'cause he feels so bad."

"It ain't that," said the man, raising himself with difficulty. "I've been thinkin' things over since I lay here, an' I don't believe there's any God anywheres that loves us like a father, same as you was sayin'."

"Oh, Dave," wailed his wife, "don't you say nothin' like that, it 'ud be laid up against you, an' you've always been such a good man, you d'serve to go to heaven."

"Heaven!" sneered the man, "heaven! don't you talk to me 'bout no heaven. I wouldn't go thar if I could, an' leave you an' the children here!" He made a gesture of indescribable loathing as he glanced about the squalid room. "What I want to ask you, sir," and he turned his bright eyes upon Immanuel, "is why you have more 'n you kin spend? Yes, I know who you be; I seen you one day comin' out your house on the av'nue! Why ain't I a right to enough to live on? I was willin' to work, an' I did work as long as I cud hol' my trowel. Why am I here, an' you yonder?" He dropped back on his dingy pillow, while the woman began to cry dispiritedly.

"Don't you mind what he says," she pleaded. "He—he's off his head with the fever an' all. I don't know what we'd a done without you, sir. They was goin' to put us out o' here a Tuesday."

Immanuel laid his hand upon her shoulder. "I want to talk to him," he said.

She arose obediently, snatching up a half-finished garment and falling feverishly to work.

THE LIFE OF FAITH*

The Way to Peace, Development and Every Other Blessing

TOO much mystery is made of faith. In ordinary life we understand well enough what it means. A banker who refuses a loan to one man will lend to another because he has faith in him, though to all appearance he is no better able to repay than is the man who was refused. A patient will obey his physician, and, though his life is at stake, will seek no other advice, because he has faith in the doctor's skill. A prisoner puts his case in the hands of a certain lawyer because he has faith in him. He believes that the lawyer can get him acquitted. A mountain climber ascends dangerous heights, having no fear because he has faith in his guide. A student preparing for his profession in life places himself in the hands of a tutor, assured that he will gain the necessary knowledge through him. He has faith in the tutor. In all cases there is the personal confidence, the reliance on another, which goes far beyond belief in what is said about that other or on his own assertions. It is based on conviction as to character, an assurance that the man is able and willing to do the service we expect from him, that he is a reliable man who deserves our trust. It may be simply skill that we need, or it may be that personal devotion and loyalty which we look for in moral character and not in mental power; but whatever it is that we need, we know quite well what is meant by having faith in a man.

It is only when we enter the domain of religion that faith becomes mysterious. Yet here there is infinitely better reason for exercising the quality. It is wonderful that God should seek our faith and should have offered so many encouragements to us to exercise it. The most natural thing for a man to do, it would seem, would be to place confidence in the guidance of his Maker. Yet so reluctant are we to do so, that though he woos us by promises and fond assurances, we still doubt him and follow our own inclinations. If anything occurs in our lives that disappoints us, and mystifies us, we are ready to ask if God really cares, or is controlling the events of our lives. Even our earthly parents, who are liable to err, get more of our faith than we give to God, who is infinitely wise and infinitely kind. How earnestly God desires our faith is seen in the examples he has given, as well as in his invitations. How highly he speaks of Abraham, imperfect as his faith was, calling him his friend, and how beautifully he commended him for bearing the test of his offering of Isaac! In the case of Job, too, there is the expression of satisfaction that Job continued to trust in him in spite of the troubles that he naturally misunderstood. It is evident that God appreciates the faith of his children, and is pleased to see them trusting in him in the face of discouragement. It is hard to conceive of conduct of ours making any difference to the infinite majesty of God, but throughout his Word, there are indications that faith in him, exercised by us, does give him pleasure.

For ourselves, it is the key to every blessing. It brings peace, for there is no need of anxiety when we have committed all our lives to his keeping. We are saved from distress, for the things that men call misfortunes are accepted by the trusting man as discipline sent by his Father for some wise purpose. Even death itself is not to be dreaded, for in the waters of Jordan he promises to be with us and to give us new life after we have crossed the flood. The duties that faith involves also promote our happiness. He who trusts in God proves his faith by keeping his commandments. He places himself in line with the will of God and so ensures his highest development. Trusting in him, we do those things that we believe he wishes us to do, and having his approval, are indifferent to the criticism or censure of the world. Faith also implies communion with God. Not only the prayers in which we plead for the things we need, but that holy converse in which we utter the longings of the soul and receive the revelations that he makes to the trusting soul. Light comes we know not how, one mystery after another disappears and those that remain unsolved are but adjourned to the eternal future, in which all things will be made plain.

The Failures of a Good Man

Even Moses Weak when he Lost Touch with God

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

ALL our life, and all our words, if we are true pilgrims upon earth, should speak to those around us, as Moses spoke to his brother-in-law, Hobab (Num. 10:29). If they do not see that ours is an enviable lot, because God is with us, there is something wrong in our lives. If we are children of light we cannot help shining. But when Hobab replied, "I will not go; but I will depart to mine own land, and to my kindred," Moses urged him to stay, saying, "Leave us not, I pray thee, forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou shalt be to us instead of eyes." Here was a mistake. It was well indeed that that he should say "It shall be if thou go with us, yea, it shall be, that what good soever the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee;" but what was the need for Hobab's eyes, where the Lord had promised, "My presence shall go with thee?" Was the leading of God to be dispensed with? Immediately after this we read: "And they set forward from the mount of the Lord, three days' journey; and the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them three days' journey, to seek out a resting place for them." What need, then, to lean on Hobab's experience? God knew the way better than Hobab. How often we make a slip, out of a worldly consideration of politeness or etiquette, without first weighing whether this is pleasing to God? We are not told whether Hobab did accompany them, but only that the descendants of Moses' father-in-law dwelt among the people in the wilderness of Judah (Jud. 1:16).

With the renewal of a pilgrim's life, the murmurings of the people were renewed, and now for the first time Moses lost patience with them, and began to consider himself. Could it be that one step without taking counsel with God had prepared for this? The people murmured, the fire of the Lord burnt and devoured among them; the people cried unto Moses, Moses prayed unto the Lord, and the fire abated. So far well; but it did not stop there; the mixed multitude of camp followers (Exod. 12:38) that was among them fell a-lusting. This spread the contagion of discontent. "And the children of Israel also wept again, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat?"

The flesh in the camp-followers aroused the flesh in the children of Israel, and they grumbled and said, "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt for naught; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick; but now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all; we have naught save this manna to look to!" (Num. 11:4-6 R.V.) Dissatisfied with God's provision! And yet all the time of their wanderings no sickness had attacked them! The fact that there was not one feeble person (or sick person) among their tribes (Ps. 105:37), except when the pestilence was sent as a judgment upon their sins, is proof positive that the manna agreed with them. Many times before had the people murmured, but now Moses "heard the people weeping throughout their families, every man at the door of his tent; and the anger of the Lord was kindled greatly; and Moses was displeased." "By this we know that we love the children of God when we love God and keep his commandments" (1 John 5:3). Moses had manifested such patience and forbearing love to the people that God calls him "meek above all the men which were upon the face of the earth" (Num. 12:3). And yet there were times of supreme crisis in which even Moses failed!

RHEUMATISM RELIEVED Without Medicine

External Remedy So Successful that the Makers Send it ON APPROVAL to Anybody

Magic Foot Drafts, the new remedy for rheumatism which has created such a furore throughout Michigan by relieving all kinds of rheumatism, no matter how severe or chronic, are now being sent all over the world on approval without a cent in advance. The sufferer is put upon honor to pay one dollar for the drafts, if satisfied with the relief they give, otherwise no money is asked. This plan is a novel one and would result in enormous loss if the drafts did not afford immediate and permanent relief. The remarkable success of the plan proves not only this, but also is a glowing tribute to the honesty of the American people.

The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet because the circulatory and nervous systems are most susceptible at this point, but they relieve rheumatism in any part of the body.

Write to the Magic Foot Draft Co., 86 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich., for a free trial pair of Drafts and their new booklet "To One With Rheumatism."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Pan-American Humor

TO the multitudes who visited the Pan-American Exposition, and the still greater multitude who would have visited it if they could, a new book, just issued by the Nutshell Publishing Co., of New York, will be equally welcome. Around the Pan, by Thomas Flemming, relates in humorous yet instructive vein, the experiences of Uncle Hank at the Exposition. There is a quaint wit, a real down-East Yankee flavor in all the actions and utterances of the principal character, that cannot fail to be greatly enjoyed by the reader.

In the course of his peregrinations, he visits every point of interest in the great show, meets with no end of queer adventures, and gets into amusing difficulties; always, however, coming out triumphantly "on top." His encounters with statesmen and other great folks at Buffalo, his adventures at the Falls, his great gondola race, his cheery humor, and bright, clean, pungent, wholesome wit, will all be greatly enjoyed by the reader. But beyond and above the innocent, side-splitting comicalities of this witty story of the great Exposition, there is a fund of information that cannot fail to prove valuable and instructive.

Uncle Hank should be one of the most popular characters of the literary season. The story of his trip will cheer up the dullest, and will give a new zest and enjoyment wherever it is read. Mr. Fleming is both the author and illustrator of his own book, and so capably does the spirit of the drawings fit the letterpress, that they really seem to belong to each other—a very rare thing in book illustration. The book is copiously illustrated throughout, contains 262 large pages, cloth bound, price $2 by mail. It possesses a unique frontispiece, being a capital portrait of McKinley by Fleming, drawn with a pen in one continuous line—probably the only work of art of its kind in the world. Large "artist proofs" of this drawing, of a size for framing, and printed on heavy paper, will be sent for 50 cents extra to readers of this journal who buy the book. Nutshell Publishing Co., New York, 78 Fifth Ave., publishers.

The Kernel of a Creed

LIKE many another ancient document, The Apostle's Creed has had an interesting and complicated history. The form which we now have originated in Western Europe, probably about the sixth century. But the present form is simply the expansion of a briefer creed, which dates from a much earlier period, and is commonly known among scholars as the "Old Roman Symbol."

From a work by Rufinus of Aquileia, written about 400 A.D., we learn that that symbol was in use in the church of Rome in the fourth century, and a comparison of Rufinus' work with a letter of Marcellus of Ancyra, written some sixty years earlier, shows that the symbol at that time ran as follows: "I believe in God, the Father Almighty, and in Christ Jesus, his only begotten Son, our Lord, who was born of the Holy Spirit and Mary the Virgin, was crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried, on the third day rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sitteth on the right hand of the Father, from whence he cometh to judge quick and dead; and in Holy Spirit, holy church, remission of sins, resurrection of flesh."

This symbol, with the exception of two or three phrases, can be traced back to the latter part of the second century, our earliest witnesses to its existence being Tertullian, of North Africa, and his older contemporary Irenaeus of Southern Gaul. There is some difficulty in reconstructing the exact text of the symbol as known to them. Many scholars maintain that it was the same as that known to Rufinus, but I think it can be shown that the phrases "only begotten" after "Christ Jesus," "of the Holy Spirit" after "born," "forgiveness of sins," and very likely also the article on the church, and possibly the phrase "our Lord" after "Christ Jesus his Son" were not a part of it in their time, so that it ran then substantially, "I believe in God the Father almighty and in Christ Jesus his Son, who was born of Mary the Virgin, was crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried, on the third day rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sitteth on the right hand of the Father, from whence he cometh to judge quick and dead; and in Holy Spirit, resurrection of flesh."

Tertullian and Irenaeus, are our very earliest witnesses to the existence of a creed. Their testimony carries us back some years beyond, 175 A.D., but not beyond the middle of the century. It would seem, in fact, that the creed known as the Old Roman Symbol must have originated between 150 and 175, a time when there was every reason for the formation of some creedal statement to guard against the misconceptions of Christianity which were widely prevalent and were causing serious trouble. It would seem, still further, that it must have originated in Rome, whence the other churches of the West certainly derived it. In Rome we can trace its existence as far back as 150-175, while there is no certain proof of any similar creed in any part of the East until well on in the third century.

SWEET BREATH

A test was made to find if just the leaving off of coffee alone would produce an equal condition of health as when coffee is left off and Postum Food Coffee used in its place.

A man from Clinton, Wis., made the experiment. He says: "About a year ago I left off drinking coffee and tea and begun to use Postum. For several years previous my system had been in wretched condition. I always had a thickly furred, bilious tongue and foul breath, often accompanied with severe headaches. I was troubled all the time with chronic constipation, so that I was morose in disposition and almost discouraged."

At the end of the first week after making the change from coffee to Postum I witnessed a marvelous change in myself. My once coated tongue cleared off, my appetite increased, breath became sweet and the headaches ceased entirely. One thing I wish to state emphatically, you have in Postum a virgin remedy for constipation, for I certainly had about the worst case ever known among mortals and I am completely relieved of it. I feel in every way like a new person."

During the last summer I concluded that I would experiment to see if the Postum kept me in good shape or whether I had gotten well from just leaving off coffee. So I quit Postum for quite a time and drank cocoa and water. I found out before two weeks were past that something was wrong and I began to get costive as of old. It was evident the liver was not working properly, so I became convinced it was not the avoidance of coffee alone that relieved me, but the great value came from the regular use of Postum."

*From The Apostles' Creed, by Arthur Cushman McGiffert. A work showing profound research, interesting to all who would like to know how the familiar form of words came to its present shape. Published, price $1.25, by Charles Scribner's Sons, 153 Fifth Avenue, New York.

SHREDDED WHOLE WHEAT BISCUIT

Some people go blindfolded through life regarding what food is best suited to sustain them, until their bodies become physical makeshifts and their minds correspondingly faulty.

Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit is a Naturally Organized Food, that is, contains all the properties in correct proportion necessary to nourish every element of the human body. "Soft cooked" cereals are swallowed without the necessary mastication, thus robbing the teeth of their NATURAL exercise, causing weakness and decay. Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit, being crisp, compels vigorous mastication and causes the NATURAL flow of saliva which is necessary for NATURAL digestion.

Sold by all Grocers.

Don't "go it blind" but send for "The Vital Question" Cook Book (free). It will remove the blindfold of habit. Address,

To All Who Suffer from SPINAL DEFORMITIES

85 per cent. cheaper than the old methods. 100 per cent. better. Weighs ounces where others weigh pounds. For Men, Women and Children; none too young, none too old to be relieved. We offer the only Scientific Appliance ever invented for the relief of this unsightly condition; relieved the inventor, Mr. P. B. Sheldon, of curvature of the spine of thirty years' standing.

Throw Away the Cumbersome and Costly Plaster-of-Paris and Sole-Leather Jackets

Our appliance is light in weight, durable, and conforms to the body as not to evidence that a support is worn. It is constructed on strictly scientific anatomical principles, and is truly a godsend to all sufferers from spinal troubles, male or female. We also make Scientific Appliances for protruding abdomen, weak back, stooping shoulders. Send for free booklet and letters from physicians, physical instructors, and those who know from experience of our wonderful appliances. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Write to-day for measurement blank. Don't wait.

WESLEYVILLE, PA.
I am permanently relieved of a weak and deformed spine, by the use of the Philo-Burt Company's Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing it for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches and eight months from the time I first commenced the use of the Brace, I could do as much work as any able bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and nothing but some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliance, they are so light and comfortable (and can be removed at will) that it is almost a pleasure to wear one.

Mr. List writes the above after 6 years' experience with our appliance, the latter 2 years of which he has not worn any brace or support.

Twenty Daughters of America for the Hall of Fame

THE QUESTION OF THE WEEK

IF twenty additional niches were provided in the Hall of Fame, to be devoted exclusively to women, what twenty American women (not now living) would you select for such honor?

IN this issue, the entire space usually allotted to THE MAIL-BAG is devoted to the discussion of the question of the week, which is one that will interest all classes of readers:

What Determines True Greatness

The twenty "immortals" among American women are difficult to select, for the reason that many qualities which determine a woman's true greatness are not visible to the public eye—such, for example, as the moral worth resident in the characters of Nancy Hanks and the mother of Jonathan Edwards. But looking at the question on all sides, the writer believes that the twenty names which follow are each entitled to a place in the Hall of Fame: The educators, Emma C. Willard and Maria Mitchell; the sculptor, Harriet G. Hosmer; the authors, Lydia H. Sigourney, Margaret Fuller, Louise M. Alcott, Lucy Larcom, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Alice Cary, Phoebe Cary; the Indian girl, Pocahontas; the missionary, Ann H. Judson; the actress, Charlotte Cushman; the three most notable women at the Capital, namely, Martha Washington, Abigail Adams and Dolly P. Madison. Lastly, I should add those great philanthropists and reformers, Dorothea L. Dix, Lucy Stone, Lucretia Mott, and Frances E. Willard.

J. D. MEESE.

Twenty Candidates for the Niches

1. Mary Washington: model woman, noble mother of noble son. 2. Martha Washington: Heroic and devoted wife of our first President. 3. Dolly Madison: social queen; brave, too, she saved precious documents, including Declaration of Independence, when the British were at the doors of the White House, 1814. 4. Lucretia Mott: eloquent preacher against slavery. 5. Emma Willard: pioneer educator. 6. Mary Lyon: founder of Mt. Holyoke Seminary, the first one where any save daughters of the rich, could obtain the higher education. 7. Lydia Maria Child: author and philanthropist, one of the first, if not the first woman, to act as newspaper correspondent. 8. Mrs. Sigourney: popular writer of pure, good poetry and prose. 9. Frances E. Willard: beloved angel of temperance. 10. Lucy Stone: the first to stir the nation's heart on the subject of woman's wrongs. 11. Harriet Hosmer: celebrated sculptor. 12. Margaret Fuller Ossoli: consummate literary critic. 13. Maria Mitchell: eminent astronomer. 14. Harriet Beecher Stowe: who may well be deemed the greatest American novelist. 15. Dorothea Dix: the prisoner's friend. 16. Mrs. Lozier: founder of the New York Female Medical College, 1863. 17. Isabella Thoburn: who organized the first Woman's College in India, 1887. 18. Alice Cary: writer of sketches and poems, thoroughly American in tone. 19. Phoebe Cary: who wrote less copiously, but not less charmingly, than her sister. 20. Louisa M. Alcott: whose books delight young people the world over.

AMELIA HOYT.

Brave Moll Pitcher Not Forgotten

Provide a niche for Harriet Beecher Stowe, for the Indian princess, Pocahontas; for Betsy Ross, who made our flag; for Mary Washington, the mother, and Martha Washington, the wife, of our first President; for Moll Pitcher, for Frances Willard, for Dorothea Dix, the "prisoner's friend," for Hannah Duston, Maria Mitchell, Lucy Stone, Anna Dickinson, Mary Chilton, the first woman to set foot on Plymouth Rock, and Priscilla Alden, Abigail Adams, Dolly Madison, Lucretia Mott, Lydia M. Child and Elizabeth Zane.

CLARA E. COOPER.

Civil War Heroines

My choice would be the women who devoted their time, services,—and in many cases their lives,—to the care of soldiers in the Civil War: relieving want and suffering, administering spiritual as well as bodily comfort, giving of their own substance, and being almoners of those whose duties lay in other directions. Who threw themselves into the spirit of the war, learned the characters of generals, watched the policy of the government, studied the course of the armies, and so helped wonderfully to keep up the enthusiasm, to rebuke lukewarmness and check despondency; and thus to strengthen the armies by shaming the deserting, self-saving cowards back into service. It is impossible to overestimate the amount of consecrated work done by the loyal, self-sacrificing women for the poor, wretched, starved, wounded and dying soldiers. Mrs. Witherell, Rose Billing, Mrs. E. E. George, Phoebe Allen, Mary Pettes, Arabella Barlow, Mrs. Small and Isabella Fogg, all died martyrs in their heroic devotion to the nursing of thousands of sick and wounded soldiers, for whom they laid down their lives that the soldiers might live to fight the battles of their country. Mrs. Harris, Helen Gibson, Mrs. Spencer and Mrs. Harvey ministered to the wounded while shot and shell were crashing around them on every side. Mrs. Fales distributed $150,000 worth of comforts, emptied 7,000 boxes of stores, and was under fire during the seven days' fight on the peninsula caring for the falling men. Annie Etheridge, Margaret Breckinridge and Katherine Wormley rendered great service in their untiring labors among the wounded on the hospital ships. Then among the loyal women who risked their lives in defence of their national flag, were Effie Titlow, Mrs. Alfred Clapp, Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Booth, who said

Troy Female Seminary has been the educational home of 6,000 women. Mary Lyon (1797-1849), founder of Mt. Holyoke College. Dorothea L. Dix (1802-1887), a philanthropist, who in less than four years visited and investigated 18 States prisons, 300 county jails and houses of correction, and more than 500 almshouses. Lucretia Mott (1793-1888), the Quakeress reformer, who "wrought quietly but mightily for God." Martha Washington, Abigail Adams, Lucy Webb Hayes, Maria Mitchell (1818-1889), first woman astronomer and long time professor of astronomy in Vassar College. Lucy Stone Blackwell, Mary Abigail Dodge, Louise M. Alcott, Lydia Maria Child, Helen Hunt Jackson, Alice and Phoebe Cary.

M. R. D. DINGWALL.

Mothers and Stepmothers Recognized

First I would like to see Mary Ball, the mother of George Washington, whom we, as a nation, owe such a stupendous debt of gratitude, occupying the most prominent niche. Next to her I would place Martha Washington, the wife. Then I think I should like to see the faithful Nancy Hanks, who has given to our country such a truly noble and tender spirit as Abraham Lincoln, and by her side I would place his step-mother, Sarah Johnson, whose motherly kindness made the hard years of his early life easier and brighter for the tender-hearted, lonely little boy. In the fifth niche I should like to see Julia Neale the mother of our famous Stonewall Jackson, a truly heroic woman of deep Christian faith and fortitude. Then would come Dolly Madison, America's most gracious social queen, who so heroically rescued and carried away the Declaration of Independence, when the White House was burned by the British. Dorothea Dix, the heaven-sent angel of mercy and prison reform, should occupy the seventh niche. Then should come Lucretia Mott, slavery's enemy and freedom's friend, and by her side Harriet Beecher Stowe. Along with these noble women I should like to see Eliza Ballou, the brave and domestic mother of James A. Garfield. In rapid succession I would fill the remaining ten niches with the following noble and noted women: Louisa May Alcott, Frances E. Willard, Sarah Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Palmer Peabody, Elizabeth Payson Prentiss, Maria Mitchell, Ella Starr, Margaret Miller Davidson and Jane Nye Hammond.

VIRGINIA JORDAN.

Many More Names Available

I take pleasure in enclosing a list of eminent American women (deceased), whose names are eligible to a place in the Hall of Fame. We could select twenty more from among heroines of Revolutionary war. As many from those of Civil war, half twenty from the group of gifted women who have worked for each of three reforms: Anti-slavery, woman suffrage, and temperance. Then there are half twenty, I doubt not, who would be eligible as pioneers in the three leading professions, so that of the talented and brave and helpful wives and mothers of presidents, great preachers and explorers, it would be practicable to fill up the list of the second hundred names.

Martha Dandridge Custis Washington (wife of George Washington), Miss Hannah Adams, Mrs. Lucretia Coffin Mott, Mrs. Sarah Margaret Fuller D'Ossoli, Mrs. Harriet Elizabeth Beecher Stowe, Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale, Mrs. Jane Gray Cannon Swisshelm, Mrs. Annie Turner Wittenmeyer, Mrs. Emma Hart Willard, Miss Mary Lyon, Mrs. Frances Dana Gage, Mrs. Phoebe Worrell Palmer, Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, Miss Maria Mitchell, Miss Anna Ella Carroll, Mrs. Lucy Stone, Mrs. Mary Torrans Lathrop, Miss Frances Elizabeth Willard, Miss Isabella Thoburn, Miss Mary Grew.

LUCY A. SWITZER.

Letters have also been received from L. T. Rightsell, Mrs. Anna B. Chambliss, W. D. Switzer, Mary Drew, Mrs. E. Resdon, Mrs. J. W. Wilson, W. W. Case, Sarah S. Walker Wainwright, Isaline V. Wright, Abigail Pearce, Jennie L. Scott, Mrs. Jennie Saville, F. B. M., Mrs. Edgar Myers, and others.

Only Five Really Famous Women Available

The Hall of Fame necessarily excludes many that would be niched in halls of honor, because fame demands not only merit but the having that merit, a familiar phrase among the many; and twenty such women this country has not yet buried, nor, if royalty be eliminated, has any nation produced that number in a period of four hundred years. The list of America's truly famous women comprises only five names—Pocahontas, Martha Washington, Betsy Ross, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and, in South America, Santa Rosa de Lima de Peru.

ROBERT MACBURNAY.

Great Educators and Reformers

At the head of the list I would place the name of Frances E. Willard (A. D. 1839-1898), teacher, editor, reformer, president of the National and of the World's W. C. T. U. In 1883 she visited every State and territory in the Union and every city having 10,000 or more inhabitants. Next in far-reaching service is Harriet Beecher Stowe (1812-1896), whose book, Uncle Tom's Cabin, reached a sale of 500,000 copies in less than five years, and has been translated into twenty different languages. Ann Hasseltine Judson (1789-1826), first American woman to leave her home and become a martyr in the cause of foreign missions. Anne Hutchinson (1590-1643), enthusiast and reformer. Phoebe Palmer (1807-1874), apostle of the Higher Life, of whom Talmage said, "Columbus no more certainly discovered our New World than Phoebe Palmer discovered that new world of light and love and joy and peace, which she spoke of," and says that 25,000 souls were saved under her instrumentality.

THE EXCAVATIONS WHERE THE GREAT LIBRARY WAS FOUND

KING SARGON—FROM A BAS-RELIEF

KING SARGON'S ROYAL LIBRARY OF 150,000
CLAY TABLETS

Light from Babylon's Ruins!

3,800 YEARS OLD,
NOW IN PROFESSOR
HILPRECHT'S HANDS

WHAT is universally regarded as the most important archaeological material that ever came to this country, has just arrived at the University of Pennsylvania. In the seven years that Professor Herman Volrath Hilprecht, the foremost authority in cuneiform paleography, has been identified with exploring tours in the deserts of ancient Babylonia, his greatest achievements have been his latest discoveries, which rank as among the most important archaeological finds of the century. A library, of which every volume or tablet was written prior to the time when Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, was recently excavated at Nippur, and the treasures were brought to this country in twenty-two large cases, each containing from six to eight boxes.

The records which civilization previously had of life in Babylonia, as far back as 2000 B. C., have now been made to seem almost modern by Professor Hilprecht's discovery of the Temple of Bel, or, as the Old Testament names it, Baal, and the Sargonic palace of 4000 B. C. The library of the Temple of Bel is a library recounting the deeds and life of a people 3,800 years before the Christian era, and 7,000 years before the present day.

It is a library made of earth itself—of baked bricks—for the Babylonians and Assyrians wanted their deeds to live in the ages. They used but little perishable parchment; they made their books of baked mother earth, and in 7,000 years, time has failed to obliterate them. The tablets have sometimes been broken, but the workings are still there to testify that, thousands of years ago, those nations ranked with the world to-day in learning and the higher spheres of life.

More than a year ago, Professor Hilprecht left Philadelphia for Constantinople, expecting to continue his work of organizing the new Semitic section of the Imperial Ottoman Museum, which occupies the third new building recently erected by the Sultan's order, and at the same time to examine and study the immense results of the latest expedition to Nippur, which had arrived at Constantinople. As Professor Hilprecht was about to leave Constantinople, the Sultan—who had heretofore, on a number of occasions, manifested his appreciation of the valuable services rendered by the Professor—presented to him, among other important antiquities, the larger part of the famous temple library, which was excavated by the expedition of the University of Pennsylvania. Professor Hilprecht, in turn, has presented this magnificent collection of tablets to the institution which he represented.

A little over twenty-five years ago, the intellectual world was startled by the announcement that the library of Assurbanipal, King of Assyria, had been discovered by the English explorers, Layard and Smith, and that among the clay volumes there were accounts of the creation and Deluge which greatly resembled the Biblical stories. It was then ascertained that these legends were copies of older tablets, that belonged to the Babylonian libraries in the southern part of the valley. For some time past, scholars have assumed that every important Babylonian city had its library, and that if the libraries could be found, most important data for the reconstruction of early history would be forthcoming. Without detracting, therefore, from the importance of this ancient Assyrian library at Nineveh, the announcement that the library of the great temple of Bel—the most famous sanctuary of the early Babylonia—has been found, surely must be regarded as being of the very greatest importance. The scribes of Assurbanipal made no copies of tablets from this library, for it had been thrown into ruin over 1600 years prior to his time. The Elamite hordes under Kudur-Nankhundi (2285 B. C.), who destroyed nearly every city of Babylonia, threw into ruins at the same time the temple library at Nippur, in which condition it remained until excavated. This fact determines that every tablet found in the ruins field director, Dr. Haynes, and a very rich harvest of nearly 20,000 tablets was recovered.

In the uppermost stratum of the mound, the excavators found coffins, which had been buried in the early centuries of the Christian era. There were also gathered a great many antiquities, which belonged to the Jews who continued to live at Nippur after the return of Ezra and Nehemiah. Prominent among the antiquities were terra-cotta bowls, containing incantations and charms, inscribed in Hebrew and Mandæan.

Down the excavators went, through twenty-five feet of debris, representing several millenniums of history, when they found a series of rooms, a number of which contained ledges or shelves built out from the wall, for the purpose of laying out the tablets in rows. The library seems to have been divided into two parts. There was a business section, for keeping accounts, and the educational quarters, with a vast library of a literary character. When the mound shall have been completely excavated it will have yielded at least 150,000 tablets, every one of which belongs to the third millennium before Christ. The complete excavation of this most important structure, with its precious literature of a long-forgotten past, will require years of continuous labor.

While the destruction of temples, palaces, libraries, and the works of art which the Elamites then accomplished, must be regarded as a gross vandalism, yet in this particular instance it was most fortunate, for, doubtless, the tablets, being mostly unbaked, would have been destroyed long since, and their contents entirely lost, if the Elamites had not destroyed the library building. When the roof collapsed, the tablets, which had been laid in rows—classified, doubtless, according to their contents—fell from their shelves upon the floor in heaps, in which condition they were found.

One by one the tablets were carefully removed from their resting places by trained workmen. It was necessary to handle them very tenderly, owing to the fact that they were moist from being buried for several millenniums in the earth. The contents of the library, as far as examined by Professor Hilprecht, prove to be most varied—in fact, practically every branch of literature known to the Babylonians is represented. Among the inscriptions are hundreds of historical texts, dictionaries, or lists of Sumerian words, with Semitic equivalents; lists of birds, animals, plants and stones; lists of words for chairs, stools and other articles of furniture; beautiful hymns, astronomical and mythological inscriptions; tablets which refer to the service and functionaries of the temple, how many garments the god Bel wore, how many temples and shrines there were at Nippur, besides those dedicated to Bel, and stating what the revenues of the temples were; also tablets containing grammatical sentences, written by students, and arithmetical calculations.

ALLAN SUTHERLAND.

NATIVE WORKMEN IN THE EXCAVATIONS AT NIPPUR

They are engaged in removing the fortress which was constructed upon the Temple of Bel, in the Parthian period belongs to the period prior to this invasion, or, in other words, was written before or about the time Abraham left Southern Babylonia for the Promised Land.

About twelve years ago, when Professor Hilprecht first rode over the mounds at Nippur, he pointed out an extensive group of mounds south of the Temple Hill, which, in his judgment, he regarded as the probable site of the temple library. About 2,500 tablets were recovered from this mound during the first campaign. The mound was called "Tablet Hill." Later excavations revealed many additional inscriptions; but on the recent campaign, Professor Hilprecht was able to establish definitely beyond any doubt that his old theory was correct. During the brief space of about eight weeks, a series of "book stacks" or rooms were cleared by his

TEXT—Matt. 7: 1 { "JUDGE NOT, THAT YE BE NOT JUDGED"

AFTER Massillon, the great court preacher of France, had finished one of his sermons, Louis the Fourteenth summoned him to his side and said, "Massillon, how is it you impress me as you do? I have heard many great orators preach. They nearly always please me. But when you preach, instead of being pleased with you, I am always discontented with myself. I always feel that I want to be a better man, as well as a better king." "Well," answered the great preacher, "the only way I can account for it, your Majesty, is because I am always preaching against myself. When I am about to make up a sermon, I say to myself, 'Massillon, what is the sin which you have hardest work to battle to-day?' And when I preach against my own sins, I generally find that there are similar sins in other hearts which I am also preaching against." If there is any truth in the words which Massillon spoke to Louis the Fourteenth, this sermon will carry a message to every pew. Of all sins, there is none more easy for speaker as well as hearer to fall into than the sin of hypercriticism.

The sin of censorious criticism is almost universal, because one is apt to commit it at first unconsciously, and without premeditation or forethought. If a party of young people are together, it is not hard to find fault with the minister, and the doctor, and the dressmaker, and the neighbor's wife and child, and house, and all that he has. It is not difficult to lay the reputation of an absent member upon the dissecting table of traducement, and cut and hack it into pieces with cruel, sharp, merciless tongues. It is not always a disagreeable opportunity to repeat the slanders and the vilifications, and the defamations and the wholesale condemnations which have been circulated about the neighborhood in reference to other people's characters.

Now, my text is a divine protest against the hasty and the unjust judgments with which we condemn our fellow-men. It is a divine protest to bring men and women to the realization of the awful damage they are doing themselves, as well as others, by the pernicious habit of censorious criticism. It is a protest to prove that, though we can honor men, and love men, and praise men, and help men, yet we must not hate men or deride men, or condemn men. Condemnation is a divine prerogative. Condemnation is a thunderbolt, which will shatter every human hand that tries to grasp it and to hurl it. Condemnation is a poisonous fang, which will destroy our own lives, as well as lacerate and instil the fatal poison into their flesh.

Conscious Imperfection

Personally, we should not condemn men, because having imperfections in ourselves, we have no right to expect and demand perfection in others. If we were holy, perhaps we might have a right to expect other people to be holy. If we were pure-minded, we might have a right to expect other people to be pure-minded. If we loved the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and mind and strength; if we were perfect husbands and perfect wives, perfect parents and perfect children, perfect in our love for our fellow-men, we might expect others to be perfect. But what right has the kettle to complain about the pot being unclean? What right has the raven to croak because her young have wings as black as the night? What right has the Pharisee to stand up and condemn the poor publican, who stood afar off and beat his breast, moaning, "God be merciful to me a sinner," when that Pharisee himself was so sinful that he was like a whited sepulchre, "which indeed appeared beautiful outward, but was within full of dead men's bones and all unclean." And what right have you, O hearer, to say your neighbor is a bad man, or a bad woman, and should be condemned, when you yourself have an evil eye, and have not yet by the grace of God plucked it out? When you yourself have an evil hand or foot, and have not yet amputated it? When you yourself have an evil tongue to speak, or an evil ear to listen against the deeds of your neighbors?

What would you think of a dissolute judge condemning a prisoner at the bar for the same sins of which he himself was flagrantly guilty? Why, such a hypocritical and unjust judge would be submerged under a tidal wave of popular scorn. Such a dishonest judge would be treated as mercilessly as was that judge who, in the darkest days of Rome's infamies, undertook to sentence some conspirators to death, while he himself was one of the conspirators. He would be dragged from the judicial bench. And yet this sin of condemning others, when we ourselves are guilty of sin, is a habit which can be laid at many a door. We superciliously demand perfection in others, while we ourselves are imperfect.

And the sad fact about human condemnation is this: The more we ourselves have gone astray; the more we ourselves have followed too much the devices and the desires of our own hearts; the more we ourselves have sinned in mind or in act, and not yet been found out by the world, the more apt are we to condemn the shortcomings and weaknesses of others, even as Lord Jeffries, the unjust English judge, was merciless toward those who were brought before him, although he himself at that time was the greatest criminal in all England. It is not the good father who is hardest upon the daughter that has gone astray; it is the bad father who is not apt to forgive the wayward child. It is not the good brother who is unwilling to save the wayward sister; it is the sinful brother, who would and does demand that his sister should be morally all right, while he himself may be morally all wrong.

A Censor Disgraced

To illustrate the truth that the more we ourselves have gone astray, the more we are apt to condemn shortcomings in others, I would read from a leaf out of the Book of Memory. I remember, many years ago, a lady's character was being assailed on a hotel porch. A member of the party at that time denounced the absent woman so severely that I turned and said: "Madam, you have no right to publicly make a charge like that against any one. Even if you had positive proof that what you say is true, you should keep your lips firmly sealed, because no one knows but that some day the bloodhounds of slander may be hunting your own tracks." This lady was very indignant. She said that I charged her with the same crimes of which the absent woman was supposed to be guilty. Within one year that woman, who was so bitter in her criticism of her sister, was proved guilty of the same offence which she charged against another.

My father, in his younger days, had almost the same experience. When he was about to be licensed for the Christian ministry, a minister was being tried before the church court. While my father stood waiting to be called for his examination, he heard a conversation between a merciless old minister and a forgiving young minister. The old minister was very bitter against his brother minister who was up for trial. "But," said the young minister to the old minister, "perhaps there is some mistake." "No," exclaimed the old minister, "I do not want to hear anything in that man's favor. I feel and know he is guilty, and therefore should be condemned." "Within one year," said my father, "that old minister, who was so hard in his criticisms upon his brother minister, was charged with the same crime. Within one year, not only was that old minister condemned in the church court, but in the Criminal Court of the State he was convicted by a jury which did not leave their seats." So, my text has a more far-reaching effect than at first might be supposed. The words, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," imply that when we are harsh, and unforgiving, and merciless, and bitter, and cruel in our criticisms of others, then we ourselves are in all likelihood goaded on by our own sins in making these criticisms about others. Therefore, if you and I feel bitter against the sins of others, it is high time for us to examine our own sinful hearts; it is high time that we fall upon our own knees in supplication, and plead with the Lord God Almighty that he might cleanse us; that he might purify us; that he might forgive us. It is the sin in our own lives that urges us on to condemn the sins in others. It is our own evil eyes that are able to see only the imperfections in others.

Mitigating Circumstances

No man should rashly condemn another, because it is often impossible for him to realize what were the mitigating circumstances in which the sin was conceived. If all men were born free and equal, as the American Declaration of Independence optimistically declares, you could judge them in the bulk. You could judge any two men as you might test two bars of steel which come from the same mold. You could judge them, as you might say that a pound of coffee ought to weigh as much as a pound of tea. But all men are not born free and equal. We are different in hereditary tendencies. Only a short time ago, at a Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, a delegate read the record of a woman with criminal tendencies, who died in 1827. The name of this woman, for obvious reasons, was not told. This woman of criminal tendencies has had up to date over eight hundred descendants. Seven hundred of these descendants have been criminals, and all were convicted at least once, and most of them more than once for crime. Thirty-six of those descendants have been murderers. "And," said the speaker, "the blood of that one woman of criminal tendencies has cost the nation in eighty years over $3,000,000 for trials and executions, and for the property they have stolen or destroyed." Is not the blood that flows in your veins happily different from that which flowed in the veins of those children?

We are different in the surroundings of babyhood and boyhood, and young manhood. Some men never knew the love of a parent. Their father and mother died when they were very young. Instead of being able to get an education, as you and I have been, they were pushed out into the great world, unprepared for the struggle of life, and told to shift for themselves. We are as different, as flowers are different. Some are planted in rich soil, others in poor. Some are cared for by loving hands; others have to fight for their lives among the bristly thorns and the overshadowing weeds. Some have enough sunlight to incubate and develop them, and just enough showers and dews to slake their thirst. Other flowers are continually being scorched by the droughts and deluged by the freshets.

Burdened by Heredity

We are all different in our inherited temperaments, and our power to resist temptation. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the quaint poet and philosopher, once wisely said: "Every child's training should begin at least one hundred years before that child is born." Have you and I any right to condemn a man's actions, unless we can put ourselves in that man's place? Then after we have put ourselves in our erring brother's place, have we a right to affirm that we, in our own strength, would have done differently than he has done? If we do thus affirm, we are not honest and true to ourselves, for some of the mightiest and best men of God have testified just the opposite. Glorious John Newton, trumpet-throated John Newton, Holy Spirit-inspired John Newton, once declared that he never saw a murderer being led away to the gallows, but he always said to himself, "There goes John Newton, unless he had been saved by the grace of God." Horatio Seymour, twice governor of New York, in a large religious meeting, once solemnly declared: "In my time, as the Chief Executive of the State of New York, I have had to examine hundreds of applications for pardons. After I had carefully examined them, and fully entered into the lives of the convicted, and realized the influences which caused those crimes, I am free to confess that, had I had the same influences about me as those men had, in every case I should have committed the same crimes, if not blacker ones." Oh, my brother, instead of condemning your brother, put yourself in your erring brother's place. Get down on your knees and offer a prayer of gratitude that you have not been tempted as he is tempted. You ought to get down on your knees, and thank God that even in your lesser temptations, you have been saved solely by an inspiring faith in a Divine love which may never have been kindled in your brother's sinful heart.

No human being should condemn his neighbor, because it is only the loving tear of pleading sorrow that can quench the fires of sin, and not the sharp tongue which "breaketh the bone." It is only the warm, gentle, protecting, outstretched arm of a friend that draws the sinner towards God and heaven; not the clenched fist of an enemy. Did you ever see a minister who became a better minister through the fault-finding of his congregation? Did you ever know of a wife who became a better wife because her husband talked against her to his neighbors? Do you know of one human being who was brought closer to your heart and to God, by being demeaned in the eyes of his fellow-men through bitter denunciations that you hurled against him? No! No! Slander and vilification and traducement and disparagement, and evil rumor, repeated by your lips, never softened or purified a sinful heart. They only drove the sinner farther away from you, and farther from God.

Discouraged by Reproof

Most people are influenced in life by sharp words and fault-findings, a great deal as was the little boy who was left in the care of an elder brother, by the death of his parents. The older brother wanted to bring his younger brother up to be a good man, so he was very sharp and strict with him. Whenever the younger son would do wrong, the older brother would scold or punish him. The result was that the younger, instead of growing better, seemed to become worse. One day, the elder brother was going down street, utterly discouraged when he met the village minister. "What is the matter, John?" said the pastor; "you look very blue." "Well," answered the young man, "I am blue. You now father died some months ago, and left Charley in my care. It seems as though I can do nothing with the boy. He becomes more and more perverse every day. I whip and scold him; I punish him in every way. It seems to do no good." Then the old minister, with a twinkle in his eye, placed his hand upon the young man's shoulder, as he said, "My boy, have you ever tried the power of love? Have you ever praised Charley when he did well? Have you ever kindly sat down by his side when he did wrong? Instead of scolding him, have you ever tried to be gentle with him? Go home, my boy, and try the power of praise and love. Perhaps you have been too severe with your tongue upon your younger brother." So John went home, and made up his mind that he would try the power of praise and love. Instead of scolding Charley, he tried to help him by kindness. He played with him in his games; he helped him in his lessons; he praised him when he did well. The result was that Charley became a different boy. One day, the little fellow looked up into the face of his big brother, and said with a happy smile, "Why, Jack, I never knew until lately that you loved me." So by our harsh words and censorious criticisms we drive men farther and farther away from God. But by loving, kind and gentle words, we can save men, instead of destroying them; we can lift men up instead of casting them down; we can inspire men with hope instead of rendering them helpless with despair; we can bind the human race together by ties of holy affection, instead of antagonizing them in mortal foes.

An Artist's Critics

It is possible to criticize even the best of men. The story is told that Zeuxis, the famous Greek artist, painted a wonderful picture of a boy holding a dish of grapes. The picture was so wonderful that the birds flew through the open window, and with their bills pecked at the grapes which the artist had drawn. But though there were thousands ready to praise, there were still many censorious critics who condemned the picture. "For," said the evil-minded critics, "if the boy had been painted as perfectly as the dish of fruit, the birds would have been afraid to approach the dish which the lad is supposed to hold in his hand." It is possible to harshly judge the actions of even the best of men. Therefore it is very easy, by bitter criticism, to destroy thousands who might be saved by the gentleness of a loving, forgiving, Christ-like tongue.

No man should condemn his neighbor, because when he destroys his brother by evil criticism, he also equally destroys himself. Some people suppose that my text: "Judge not, that ye be not judged," is only to be applied in a temporal way; that it only alludes to things of this world; that it is to be interpreted in the sense that if we are unjust to others in our censorious criticism, others will be unjust to us. The injustice which we do to others with the tongue, will always as a boomerang, come back, and strike ourselves. As Doctor Guillotin, in his old age, is said to have been executed upon the fatal instrument which he had invented in his younger days; as the Prime Minister of one of the French monarchs was confined in the very cage of torture he had builded for his enemies—a cage so short that the prisoner in it could not lie down, and so low that he could not stand upright in it. As Regent Morton was hanged to death by the spikes of the fatal image of torture known as the "Maiden," which he himself had introduced into Scotland; and as a Haman was hanged upon the gallows he had erected for the despised Mordecai, so the unjust criticisms which we mete out to others, are often the very condemnations with which we ourselves shall be condemned by our fellow-men.

Conditional Pardon

But this text has a deeper and wider meaning than merely the interpretation which implies that if we utter condemnation against our brothers, our brethren will in turn speak similar condemnations against us. It means that if we condemn our brethren, Christ will condemn us. It means that if we do not speak kindly of those who have gone wrong, Christ will not become our Divine Advocate, and plead for our forgiveness. What does the Bible say, in order to impress this truth upon our hearts? Christ gave us the Lord's Prayer as the model of our supplications. "Our Father, which art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us." In other words, we must pray that as we are ready to forgive the sins of others, so may God forgive us our own trespasses. My Lord and my God, if thy pardon is to be dependent upon our willingness to forgive and pardon others, what chance have most of us of thy forgiveness?

The older I grow, the more I believe that thousands and hundreds of thousands of Christian men and women are barred from the Divine joys of higher Christian service, because they are harsh in their criticism upon the errors of their fellow-men. You know that some people make the sinful boast that if an injustice or a wrong has ever been done against themselves, they will never forgive. How can such persons expect Christ's pardon, when they are wilfully refusing to obey Christ's command, to "judge not, so that they shall be not judged?"

Mr. Moody was the evangelist, I think, who once illustrated the impossibility of receiving Christ's pardon for sin, unless at the same time we are willing to forgive the sins of others, by telling an incident that happened at one of his revival meetings. A woman was under deep conviction of sin. She felt that Christ was ready to pardon. She felt that she was a sinner, but who, for some unknown reason, would not be pardoned. At last the great evangelist came to her and said: "Madam, there is some sin in your life which you are unwilling to give up. What is it? Will you confess the sin to me?" "Yes," answered the lady, "I will. I want to be saved. I feel that Christ is willing to save me.

But every time I begin to pray for pardon, I think of a woman who has done me in the past a great wrong. I cannot but condemn her, and judge her very harshly. Then, as I pray for pardon, Christ seems to say to me, 'Will you pardon and forgive your sister, if I pardon and forgive you?' and I say 'No, I cannot forgive her.' Then Christ, with a sad face, seems to say, 'Then I will not forgive you.' Mr. Moody said to the lady, 'Will you kneel down here by this seat, and let me pray for you?' She answered, 'I will.' Then the evangelist prayed that God might soften her heart toward her sister; that he would help her to forgive, as she wanted to be forgiven. And in the midst of the prayer the erring woman sobbed: 'Oh, Lord, I forgive! I forgive!' and she was saved. So, my brother, if you are not ready to deal gently with those who have done you wrong, and also ready to forgive others, Christ will not forgive you. "Judge not, that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged. And with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you again."

The Echo of Censure

But I have one thought more to develop, and then I am done. No man has a right to condemn his brother, because, after the condemnation is once spoken, it often happens that it can never be recalled, no matter how much he may repent. Our judgments are nearly always spoken judgments. Therefore, those evil words which speak to others about an absent friend or enemy, will, in all probability, be repeated to a second, and a third, and fourth party, until those censorious criticisms are carried everywhere. And then, my brother, the damage which we do unto others will be past recall.

Thus, my text has the same kind of a practical application as that which a mother taught her little boy, while they were spending the summer in the woods. The little fellow came running into the house in tears, and said, "Mamma, there are some bad boys out there mocking me. When I cried, 'Hello!' they shouted back 'Hello!' When I cried 'Keep still!' the bad boys cried, 'Keep still!' And when I shouted, 'I won't!' the bad boys shouted back, 'I won't!'" "Ah," answered the Christian mother, "my son, those were not bad boys answering the 'Hello'. The mocking voices you heard were only the echoing of your own. You were the bad boy. If you had called, 'I love you', you would have heard the supposed bad boys say, 'I love you'. If you had called, 'Come and sing to me', they would have answered, 'Come and sing to me'." So the Gospel invitation to-day is going to be heard a great deal in the echoes of your own voice. If we cry out to suffering and sinful humanity, "I love you," Christ will call back, "I love you." If we cry to those who have done us an injustice, "I forgive your sins," Christ will echo back, "I forgive your sins." Oh, my brother and sister, can we, shall we not, here and now, while we offer the Lord's Prayer, say with sincere and truthful hearts: "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us?"

SLUMBER-TIME AT MONT-LAWN

ONE of the charmed hours at Mont-Lawn, is that when little folks seek their rest. Some, childlike, are so full of play, they do not want to go to bed; others have played so hard all day, that they are veritable little sleepy-heads when night comes. For a while, the pretty dormitories are rather full of bustling activities. "Teacher" is helping this or that small person to release rebellious buttons and strings. Here and there, some youthful guest is tenderly dressing a smaller brother or sister. Presently, all are ready for their journey to slumberland; quiet reigns, and "Teacher" leads the little company in a simple petition to "Our Father in Heaven," returning thanks for the day's bounties, and asking God to make and keep them his own; to watch over the parents in the enameled homes; and bless the kind friends who give them their outings.

Sometimes the little company join in vensong, and people driving along the road pause to listen to the childish voices lifted to God among the hills, in words like these:

Saviour, listen while I pray.
Help me every day to be
Good and gentle more like thee.

At last, they are all asleep, and "Teacher" moves mother-like from cot to cot, with a loving glance at the little faces and a prayer in her heart for each. There are small garments needing repairs; and here and there buttons must be sewed on—tasks to which her hands may be lent for awhile. But her slumber-time comes quickly, too; for she knows her charges, who go to sleep with the birds, will awake with them, and she must be early astir.

Such fun there is in the morning! Such merry waking, such hurried dressing! Or behold! the scups are waiting, for folks to swing in them; and the grass, and the brook, and the wildflowers are ready to serve the children's pleasure. But eager as these wee people are to be away for a romp, they usually take time to ponder a bit over the tablets on the walls over the heads of their cots; these often give the names of distant friends, whose loving-kindness has provided them with downy resting-places, and a long, glad outing of ten days at beautiful Mont-Lawn; only $21 supports a cot, for a season of seventy days; and during that seventy, seven little people are successively beneficiaries of the donor. Our dormitories are very simply and inexpensively equipped, but they are as dainty and pretty as love and care can make them. The children take an affectionate interest in the Home, and the good condition of the rooms show their respect for property. We have a "Poppy Room," a "Wild Rose Room," a "Pink Room," little ones naming them thus from certain pictures on the walls. They count the flowers, which are within their reach, never putting their fingers on them. Mont-Lawn is their Home; they feel that they are little kings and queens there, and not objects of charity. They are taught to accept love's offering as truly and simply as it is given. To give one child an outing costs only $3; $6 sends two; $9, three; $12, four; $36, twelve, and so on. Cash contributions should be sent to this paper; garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

"DON'T WE HAVE NICE LITTLE WHITE BEDS?"

ANSWERED PRAYERS

R. W. K., Allentown, Pa., writes:

For nine months I worried over some business matter, the rectifying of which involved considerable labor and skill. I prayed constantly for ability and wisdom to make the correction, and finally my prayer was answered. I have been constantly praying for the good health of my family, as well as for knowledge and wisdom to bring up our dear children in the nurture and admonition of our Lord, and up to this time God has certainly blessed us all. I never undertake anything without praying for his guidance and protection. Faithful prayer and perseverance is the secret of true success.

N. C. H., Stanstead, Que., Can., writes:

It was a time of severe family affliction. The father being addicted to periodical spells of drink, the writer prayed fervently to God to restrain him, to give him strength and keep him sober. The Lord answered my petition, and I desire, through the columns of your good paper, to acknowledge his loving kindness and truth.

H. A. K., Monroeville, O., writes:

I have been much helped by the "Answered Prayer" column. I thank God for the instances of answered prayer given us, both in the Bible and outside of it. Jacob thought at the time of the famine that all things were against him (Gen. 42: 36); but when we read the whole account, of Joseph being sold into Egypt, of the favor he obtained there, of his words as he makes himself known to his brethren, "God did send me before you to preserve life," and his restoration to Jacob, we can surely link Jacob's experience with the New Testament promise, "All things work together for good to them that love God."

GREETING A NEW ARRIVAL

THE WORKING GIRLS' "VACATION HOUSE"

A SOCIAL EVENING HOUR

A Seaside Home for Working Girls

AT Ocean Grove, within a block of the beach, stands a big, roomy house of many windows. Young women with books, or crochet work, or bright bits of sewing in their hands, may be seen in happy clusters on the big upper or lower verandahs at certain hours of the day. If the weather is somewhat cool, merry circles gather indoors around the piano. But on hot days there are hours, morning and evening, when the great house seems almost deserted. Some of the occupants are enjoying a dip in old ocean's health-giving waters; others, for the moment, care-free as children, sit on the sands listening to the music of the waves; all are having a good time.

Few households at Ocean Grove, or elsewhere, have a more delightful holiday than the guests of the Tibbals' Vacation House. Yet, none of these are rich in this world's goods. Vacation House was established for the benefit of working women receiving slender salaries. A nominal board is charged, for its guests belong to a worthy class, who prefer to pay what they can. The institution is conducted by the Presbyterian Church of University Place, and its beneficiaries are drawn from the congregations of that church, and its missions, Bethlehem and Emmanuel chapels, respectively, on Sixth and Bleeker Streets. The aim of the Committee of Management, as stated in their report, is to make "a Christian home, where the atmosphere of church fellowship shall strengthen the bonds that unite us." The property was given to the church, to be used for its present benevolent purpose, by Miss Sarah J. Tibbals, as a memorial to her brother, Lewis P. Tibbals. Miss Tibbals makes frequent visits to the home, and her interest and care for it are unflinching. Miss Bessie Laffin, who presides over the establishment directs a salaried staff of four servants. Beyond making her own bed, no work is required of any guest. Two weeks is the average outing; but some women who do not get a regular vacation, come for the Saturday half holidays and Sundays.

Guests have the use of a boat on Sunset Lake; bath-house privileges are provided free, also bathing suits for those who bring none. Trolley-rides and boating, with the daily dip in the ocean, and attendance on the various gatherings in Ocean Grove Auditorium, make the days very happy ones for the guests, and they return to their duties in the city with brighter spirits and renewed energy. One of the company at Vacation House, when the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD called, was a woman whose little daughter was having a pleasant time at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's home. As readers of this paper are aware, there is a beautiful memorial cottage at Mont Lawn, erected by Miss Tibbals as a tribute to her brother. He was a philanthropist, and his life was full of beautiful benevolences. It is meet that such a man should have such noble monuments as those raised to his memory, by the sister who loves, even as he did, to go about doing good.

MISS TIBBALS

A Young Palestine Missionary

MR. Ephraim Aboosh, a native of Jerusalem, and son of a former governor there, returns to that city after a two years' course of training in America, to devote his life to spreading the Gospel among the young men of Palestine. He speaks and writes several languages, and is familiar with the East, including Palestine, Babylon, Nineveh, Bagdad and Mesopotamia. "I came to this country," he writes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "just that I might study the Gospel and carry the Glad Tidings back to my own people—especially to the youth of the land. I cannot say how profound is my sorrow when I think of the young men and children of Jerusalem, as they go all day about the streets and bazaars, with few to tell them of Christ or to turn them from evil. I cannot see how it is that the Christian world has failed so long to take that precious city for Christ.

"I expect to have a place modeled somewhat on the Y. M. C. A. institutions here, where the young men can congregate, and read and study at their ease the Word of God and other religious books. The best religious literature will be put before them; readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD visiting the Holy Land will find that paper on our tables. A branch of the work will be opened in Bethlehem.

"My purpose has been warmly commended by many prominent leaders of Christian thought in America, Dr. Burrell, of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York; Dr. Creagan, of the American Board of Foreign Missions, and Dr. Scofield, of Northfield, being among the number. I studied at Northfield for a time and Dr. Scofield took great pains with me. May the good I have received here be a blessing to the youth of Jerusalem and Bethlehem!

"I have my own way to make, and I expect to support myself by acting as guide or dragoman during part of each year to travelers in Palestine. My knowledge of the country and of many languages will enable me to be very helpful to strangers."

Mr. Aboosh is now on the ocean on his way to Jerusalem. Letters may be sent to him, to the care of the U. S. Consul in that city. Inquiries about him and his work can be addressed to Rev. Dr. C. C. Creagan, United Charities Building, New York.

The Conversion of Children

IN the whole range of Christian work, there is probably no single line of effort so rich in results, as the labors that are put forth for the conversion of children.

An interesting work among the children of the poor, is that which is carried on at the Home Garden, 322 Pleasant Avenue, New York. It is in the heart of a large, mixed foreign population. The Garden itself is the outgrowth of a Sunday School, which has been in the neighborhood for twelve years. Begun on faith, the Garden has been sustained by voluntary contributions, and has never lacked. Its Sunday School teachers are, with one exception, Italians, who were converted in the school when little children.

Miss Anna C. Ruddy, founder of the Garden, relates this incident of the work: "Five boys of the Garden were inseparable. The leader gave himself to Christ, and three more soon followed; but one held out. The others prayed and worked for his conversion, and at last he yielded. One evening I opened the door to the five. Triumphant they escorted the object of their solicitations into the room, simply saying, 'Leonard's come to get converted,' and, without waiting for preliminaries, got down on their knees. Then followed such a prayer meeting as I have seldom witnessed. It is scarcely necessary to say that Leonard became, and is still, a Christian.

"A little girl of six, who had been taught from babyhood to love the taste of beer, and to drink it constantly, told of her struggles against temptation in her own home. She was winning victories where strong men would have gone under. It was the power of God, revealed in the life of a little child.

"One Sunday in March, the Rev. E. Payson Hammond visited the Home Garden. As he told the story of the love of Jesus, and of his death and sufferings for sinners, all the children were bathed in tears. Between 30 and 40 signed the covenant, and many have given evidence of true conversion since in their lives.

"We believe there are many who only need a word of encouragement to take up this work in their classes or in their homes. To others it has never occurred that a little child might be converted. I would like to have workers among the children write to me, telling their experience along this line—what they have seen—that the enthusiasm of others of God's children may be kindled, and a great work be done in bringing the young to Christ."

A Christian Federation

In the State of Washington, the village of Sunnyside, now four years old, is a unique illustration of the application of the principles of Christian federation. It is thus described by Geo. P. Merrill in an article in the Christian World:

The fathers of the community are organized into the Christian Co-operative Colony. The people own property individually, but co-operate in building roads, bridges, telephone lines, creameries, and in furthering kindred interests. A local Telephone Association puts in the instruments at small cost, so that a telephone in a farmhouse is quite common. All the land has to be irrigated, therefore none but intelligent and industrious people have come. There is no saloon; no arrest has ever been made. During the early spring (last year) there was a community revival, conducted at first by a Presbyterian and then by a Baptist. Ninety publicly confessed Christ, and, without exception, joined the Church.

In the Federation six denominations co-operate—Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Progressive Dunkards, Congregational, Presbyterian and Christian, named in the order of numerical strength. This church owns three lots; the building has up-to-date equipment; the audience-room seats over 500, and a large addition is planned. The Ladies' Aid Society, Bible School, Christian Endeavor and general church matters are community affairs. Sunday preaching services are in charge of the different denominations according to their respective gifts toward the erection of the building. Methodists have a man on the ground, having other fields yoked with this. Baptists have a resident minister. Two Dunkard ministers take turns. The other three denominations have to send away for their ministers. Attendance is regular, irrespective of preachers.

People wishing to join choose their denomination and unite when that branch is in charge. For example, March 16 was Congregational Day. Over 500 were present at ten o'clock. The Baptist minister led in prayer, the Dunkard brother made the announcements and a Congregational minister presided and preached. At eleven 275 came together for Bible School.

People had been invited to bring their lunch and remain over to the afternoon service of communion and reception of members into the Congregational branch of the Federated Church, and fifty enjoyed together a social meal. People drive from one to fifteen miles to this Federated Church.

The Hopeless Life of the Children in "Anthracite"

II. Child Slavery at the Mines

...BY...
Francis H. Nichols
Our Special Correspondent

ON the railroad track, near the mining town of Edwardsville, I met a child carrying a sack filled with coal screenings, that he had stolen from a Company's pile, for use in his mother's cook stove. The child certainly did not look a day over eleven years old. His face was pale and his cheeks were hollow. He was very round-shouldered for a child of his age, and he showed the stunting and withering effects of a struggle for existence against tremendous odds.

"How old are you?" I asked.

"Thirteen, goin' on fourteen," was the reply.

"And you work in the breaker?"

"Sure, and so does all the other lads in the town, when they're not striking. You haven't got it in for me?" he asked, in a scared tone. "I s'pose you is some kind of a Company's detectives, ain't you?"

I succeeded in allaying his fears by telling him that I was merely a visitor in the town, and that I was living in a miner's boarding-house.

"Tell me a little about your work in the breaker," I said.

"Well, that's it over there," and he pointed to a tall, black structure outlined against the sky. "Four hundred lads works in that building. There's six breakers in this town, so that all the lads is working. We go to work at seven in the mornin' and stay until six. We have half an hour at noon fur eatin'. We sort over the coal as it comes out of the sieves. We pick out the slate and slag. That's all we do—see?"

"Rather hard work," I suggested.

"Yes, it is, until you get used to it. The coal dust's pretty bad. Sometimes it gets into your eyes and makes you kind of blind. The breaker isn't heated in winter, so you got to get used to bein' cold all day. But," he added proudly, "I don't mind it no longer. The only thing I kick about is the way the coal cuts my fingers. Pickin' over the coal will once in a while wear a feller's nails off and wear the skin down to the bone, so he has to lay off for a week until they heals up. Say, isn't it too bad that they can't invent a way of keepin' coal from wearin' a feller's fingers off'n his hands?"

"How much pay do you receive?"

"Sixty cents a day. The most you can make in the breaker is eighty cents a day. I'll be makin' that in two years from now. I started on forty cents. I am gettin' there."

"How long have you worked in the breaker?"

"Six years. Ever since me fadder was burned in a gas explosion in the mine. He's par'lyzed for life, you know."

"Then you must have been seven years old when you began picking coal?"

The child hesitated. "Well," he said slowly, "it makes no difference how old I was. Me papers and affydvavits was O. K. The Comp'ny has got 'em now. They says I was thirteen when I started to work, and that's what I was."

"Are many in the breakers younger than you?"

"Why, sure. I'm one of the oldest. I am makin' sixty cents. Most of 'em is eight and nine years old; but their papers is all right, though," he added earnestly. "The papers says they's all thirteen, goin' on fourteen."

"Did you ever go to school?"

For the first time in our talk the child laughed; not with the innocent, rippling laugh of childhood, but with the hard cynicism of a man of fifty.

"School!" he echoed. "Say, mister, you must be a green hand. Why, lads in Anthracite doesn't go to no school; they works in the breaker." And as he trudged off along the railroad track with the heavy sack of coal on his little stooping shoulders, he looked back at me quizzically, as though he wondered what strange manner of man this might be, who could suppose for a minute that a child born under the coal-dust cloud could ever receive the light of an education.

The child spoke the simple truth. Boys do not go to school in Anthracite. They work in the breakers, and the intellectual and physical stunting of childhood is the saddest part of life at the mines.

The coal that is brought up in cars from the base of the shaft is in large lumps, just as it has been blasted or hewn out of the vein. From the cars it is dumped into crushing machines, which grind it into the various sized lumps in which it is sold to the consumer. These machines are in the cupola at the top of the breaker, and from this process the breaker takes its name. The broken coal falls into enormous revolving sieves on the floor below the crusher. From the sieves it passes through chutes that wind throughout the entire building to the ground floor, when it is loaded on freight cars. Mixed with the coal is more or less slate, rock and dirt, and to pick this out of the unceasing river of coal, is the work of the boys and old men employed in the breakers.

Fastened to the edges of the chutes are little seats where the workers sit from morning till night, forever picking over the black stream that flows past them. An ordinary breaker

Men like Mitchell, who champion the miner's cause on general principles, without always going into the merits of the case, assign the miner's small pay as the only reason which induces him to deprive his own offspring of an education and the rights of every child born under the American flag; but my observation of miners and their philosophy of life, has led me to believe the miner himself, quite as much as the Company, is directly responsible for the mental and moral stunting of the miner's child. I believe that the condition of the children of Anthracite would be little improved if the present strike were to end in victory for the miner and the increase of his wages.

Poor as the miner is, the two or three dollars a week that his child can earn in the mine, do not make enough difference in the family income to compensate for the lack of education and opportunity which offer to the child his only hope of ever escaping from the prison of a miner's life. To a very large extent, the miner takes his child to the breaker from choice. The troglodyte has the habit of child-stunting. For the miner, there is no other world than the colliery town, and there is no other vocation for his child than the coal-black burrow. That the miner can take this view, only goes to prove his own assertion that his life and environment are lowering him.

The image of God is grimed with the soot of the mine. "Why shouldn't the lad work in the breaker?" miner's wives have said to me. "He is strong and healthy, and if he went to the school, he would be hanging around most of the afternoon doing nothing. Besides, book learning, won't help him much in the mine."

Another indication of the prevalence of the child-stunting habit in Anthracite, is the appearance in the land during the last ten years of the stocking factories, which make a market for the labor of miner's little daughters. A considerable percentage of all the hosiery worn in the United States, is produced in the enormous mills in the vicinity of Wilkesbarre. In these mills, are employed thousands of little girls. They are paid under the piece-work system, and are able to earn from $1.50 to $3.00 per week. The limit of age at which girls are allowed to work in Pennsylvania is thirteen. For every child who earns a pittance at the stocking-loom, an affidavit is on file in the mill office, declaring that she is thirteen years old. Yet one does not have to employ close scrutiny to see that very few of the girls are over ten. They are miner's children, the sisters of boys, who, under a sworn guarantee of twelve, are picking the slate out of the coal for forty cents a day.

Why have the stocking manufacturers selected Anthracite for their factory sites? Because they know that the child labor demanded by their business can be more readily supplied in the land of the miner than anywhere else in the United States. They realized the prevalence of child-stunting when they came to Anthracite.

"My oldest child was a girl," a woman said to me. "When my husband was killed in the mine cave-in, the three boys went to work in the breaker. The forewoman of a factory promised to make a place for Mary at the loom, where she could make fifty cents a day. 'But she isn't twelve years old,' says I. 'Oh, that's easy,' says she; 'lots of them are younger nor that. You can have the papers made out any age you want to for a half a dollar.' 'No,' I says thinking it over. 'The Bible says not to tell no lies, and because of that, I can't lie about her age, although I'd like to do it for the money. I'll bring her to the factory the day she's thirteen,' I says. I'm glad now of what I done, because when she were twelve year and eleven months, God, He took her. The asthma she had, kind of turned into consumption, so she died. And she couldn't go to heaven and tell them. CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK employs from 400 to 600 boys and men. Over every gang of fifty is a foreman.

The interior of the breaker is as cheerless as its outside. Nothing is painted, but over everything is a heavy coating of coal dust. The sieves make such dense and continuous clouds of dust that it is sometimes difficult to see within the breaker. Strung along the wall are a few steam pipes that connect with the mine engines. These are supposed to heat the building in winter. But as all the steam is needed in the mine, very little is ever allowed to percolate through the breaker. Miners say that the temperature of the breaker is always the same as out-doors.

The Company insists that on file in its office it has an affidavit sworn before a Justice of the Peace, for every boy who receives from forty to eighty cents for ten hour's work in the breaker. The affidavit declares the boy's age to be twelve years or over. Therefore, "there is no such thing as child labor in the mines." In name, though not in fact, every breaker boy is of the legal age prescribed by the law of the State of Pennsylvania for work in the mine. That means that almost every breaker boy's father must have committed perjury in order to place his sons in a life employment, that shuts out all hope of an education, not only from books, but also from contact with the refinements or amenities of civilized life; that so limits his field of opportunity, that he is of necessity condemned to a life that shrivels his intellect, begrimes his soul, and tends to make of him a brute.

Professor Hilprecht's Discoveries

IT is with a feeling of genuine satisfaction that we are enabled to place before our readers in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in advance of all other publications, the photographs of Prof. Herman V. Hilprecht's latest Assyrian discoveries. His principal "find" includes 150,000 engraved tablets, constituting practically the complete library of an Assyrian monarch, who reigned, and warred, and made extensive conquests far back in the remotest ages of the world's history—thousands of years before the birth of Christ, and even before the patriarch Abraham had set out from his native country for the Land of Promise. It will require years of scholarly application to decipher and translate this huge mass of ancient literature; but when it is accomplished, a great light will be shed upon the life and manners and beliefs of a period concerning which the world has thus far been wholly uninformed. What great monarchs then ruled the earth, what civilization prevailed, and what religious opinions dominated the minds of men, will unquestionably be told when those silent, long-buried tablets are made to speak.

Two Assyrian kings bore the name of Sargon. The first of these was the warlike ruler of Agade or Akkad, and is variously known on the inscriptions as Sargon, Sargane and Sarrukin. He was a leader of Napoleonic ambitions, and conquered in quick succession Babylonia, Elam and Phenicia, and set his "image" up on the shores of the Mediterranean. He was the founder of the Assyrian monarchy and flourished about 3800 B.C. Another Sargon ruled Assyria about 722 B.C., and is referred to in Isaiah 20: 1—the only occasion on which the name appears in the Bible. During the excavations in 1888, the American expedition brought to light much that related to the reign of Sargon I., but the most recent and astounding discovery of the royal library of that powerful monarch, eclipses in interest and importance all previous experiences. It is the oldest library in the world, and to the University of Pennsylvania and its distinguished representative belongs the honor of a discovery which, as has been truly said, makes all ancient history seem modern by comparison. It has been asserted, probably on the authority of very early writers, that the library which Sargon founded was especially rich in works on history, astrology and astronomy. There are many legends concerning this mysterious monarch, some of which regard him as a primitive Solomon, while others relate how his mother placed him, while a babe, in an ark of reeds and bitumen, and set him afloat on the Euphrates, and how he was taken up by a ferryman and reared as his own son, until the time arrived for disclosing his rank, when he was hailed as Sargon, "the constituted king." This semi-mythical ruler has now become an historic reality; yet before Sargon (according to Berossus) there had reigned in Babylonia a line of monarchs covering a period of thousands of years and even antedating the Flood! Who can tell what further surprising secrets may yet be found hidden in the bosom of the earth, in this primeval seat of civilization?

The Children of the Mines

WHEN Elizabeth Barrett Browning, many years ago, described, in verses of wondrous power and pathos, the sad and hopeless lives of the poor, little child-slaves in the British factories, her genius stirred all England to the liveliest sympathy. Yet we doubt whether their condition was as deplorable, in many respects, as that of the army of children who labor in the Pennsylvania coal-breakers, and whose unfortunate lives are graphically set forth in the article which appears elsewhere in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is no imaginary sketch this, which recites the tragedy of childhood in one of the oldest and greatest States of our Union. That hundreds and thousands of boys and girls should be enslaved in coal-breakers and factories at an age when, under the law, they should be enjoying the benefits of education at our public schools would be incredible, if it were not indisputable. This is done, it is alleged, by the collusion of all the parties interested, for the purpose of evading the law.

It is a crying scandal for a great State like Pennsylvania to tolerate such conditions within its borders. If the facts are as claimed, the State authorities are culpable for not having made the whole question of child-labor a subject of the fullest investigation long ago, and for the failure to stringently enforce the laws, in order that the children might be secured in their educational birthright. Reared in ignorance, trained only to the coarse and unremunerative toil of the breakers and the mills, and reaching manhood and womanhood through a long, hopeless travail of semi-slavery, unrelieved by any of the developing and uplifting agencies that other children enjoy, it can hardly be expected that these children of the mines could become intelligent citizens of our Republic. Their weary and unnatural servitude in childhood, their joyless youth, their deprivation of almost all educational advantages, as well as the absence of all but the harshest and most depressing social surroundings, combine to make of them fit material for the great army of the discontented. And the responsibility for the blighted careers of this section of the youth of our nation must be laid at the door of the Keystone State. To blame the parents, or the mine owners and manufacturers is not to the point. There stands the law, and it should be enforced and implicitly obeyed. If we continue to sow the wind, it is inevitable that by and by we must reap the whirlwind.

A Grand Missionary Gone

FEW men were better known in the field of missionary effort, or more universally loved than the Rev. Dr. Stephen L. Baldwin, who passed away recently at his home in Brooklyn. Dr. Baldwin was sixty-seven years of age, and had been in the ministry since 1858. From 1859 till 1882, with the exception of a short interval, he was a missionary in China. While in that country, he was Superintendent of the Foochow Mission, edited the Chinese Recorder, translated the Scriptures and the Methodist Church Discipline into Chinese, and did other very valuable work. He afterwards held Methodist pastorates in Newark, N. J., Nyack, N. Y., and Boston, Mass. In 1889 he was elected Recording Secretary of the Methodist Missionary Society.

Dr. Baldwin took a prominent part in the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in New York in 1900. His contributions on Chinese missionary work have appeared from time to time in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and were greatly valued. He was a man of the noblest Christian type, and during his long career of consecrated effort, was instrumental in drawing many to Christ. He belongs to that illustrious company of those who have turned many to righteousness and who "shine as the stars forever and ever."

Gospel Services in a Base-Ball Field

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

THE unique effort described in this journal, on June 25, as having been inaugurated in Boston, Mass., to reach non-churchgoers, has proved successful. Dr. A. C. Dixon reports that "in spite of many hindrances there has been a good attendance and much blessing." It has, therefore, been decided to continue the meetings for another month. Rev. H. W. Ewing, of the Winthrop Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Roxbury, and Dr. A. C. Dixon, of the Ruggles Street Baptist Church, are the preachers, and Prof. Herman A. Shedd, assisted by Mr. Charles L. Estey, has charge of the musical exercises.

The meetings, as previously stated, are under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, and are held in the National Base-ball grounds every Sunday afternoon. It is distinctly a forward movement, inasmuch as the location is a favorite resort of a large mass of the population who do not, as a rule, attend the churches. Special invitations have been distributed through the district, and the novelty of seeing the resort metamorphosed into a church, has attracted large numbers. The services have been adapted to the character of the congregation, and have proved thoroughly enjoyable. There is good reason to expect a blessing on all such efforts. They are prompted by a spirit of obedience to Christ's parting injunction to preach the Gospel to every creature. Impediments, of which the churches are ignorant, often keep men away from the house of God, and prejudices, the result in part of heredity, and in part of association, operate in many minds. These may be removed when the Gospel is presented in its true form, as a blessing to all. Men who have opposed it all their lives learn at such meetings that they have misconceived its character, and realize that it is a power that can transform their lives.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

The Refuge of the Poor

—O YE SEWING WOMEN on starving wages! O ye widows turned out from a once beautiful home! O ye female teachers kept on niggardly stipend! O ye despairing women seeking in vain for work, wandering along the docks and thinking to throw yourselves into the river at night! O ye women of aching sides and weak nerves and short breath and broken heart! You need something more than human sympathy. You need the sympathy of God. Climb up into his arms; he knows it all, and he loves you more than father or mother or husband ever could or ever did; and instead of sitting down wringing your hands in despair you had better begin to climb. There are heights of consolation for you, though now "there is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

The Mother's Hand

—YOU MOTHERS, who rocked and lullabied the family brood until they took wing for other nests, and never appreciated what you had done and suffered for them, will yet be rewarded. Your hand was well favored when you were young, and it was a beautiful hand, so well rounded, so graceful that many admired and eulogized it; but hard work calloused it, and twisted it, and self-sacrificing toil for others paled it, and many household griefs thinned it, and the ring which went on only with a push at the marriage altar, now is too large, and falls off, and again and again you have lost it. Poor hand! Weary hand! Worn-out hand! But God will reconstruct it, reanimate it, readorn it, and all heaven will know the story of that hand. What fallen ones it lifted up! What tears it wiped away! What wounds it bandaged! What lighthouses it kindled! What storm-tossed ships it brought into the Pearl-beached Harbor! Roll on everlasting rest for all the toiling, and misunderstood, and suffering, and weary children of God, and know right well that to join your hand, at last emancipated from the struggle, will be the soft hand, the gentle hand, the triumphant hand of him who wipeth away all tears from all faces.

The Influence of a Child

—WE OFTEN talk about the influence of parents upon children. I never hear anything said about the influence of children upon their parents. You go to school to them. You no more educate them than they educate you. With their little hands they have caught hold of your entire nature and you cannot wrench yourself away from their grasp. You are different men and women from what you were before they gave you the first lesson. They have revolutionized your soul. There are fountains of joy in your heart which never would have been discovered had they not discovered them. Life is to you a more stupendous thing than it was before those little feet started on the pathway to eternity. Oh, how many hopes, how many joys, how many solitudes that little one has created in your soul. You go to school every day—a school of self-denial, a school of patience, in which you are getting wiser day by day; and that influence of the child over you will increase and increase; and though your children may die, from the very throne of God they will reach down an influence to your soul, leading you on and leading you up until you mingle with their voices and sit beside their thrones.

Incoming Ships

—WE TAKE our stand in the watch-tower, and we look off, and through the glass of inspiration we look off and see a whole fleet of ships coming in. That is the ship of peace, flag with one star of Bethlehem floating above the top-gallants. That is the ship of the Church, mark of salt wave high up on the smoke-stack, showing she has had rough weather, but the Captain of salvation commands her and all is well with her. The ship of heaven, mightiest craft ever launched, millions of passengers waiting for millions more, prophets and apostles and martyrs in the cabin, conquerors at the foot of the mast, while from the rigging hands are waving this way as if they knew us, and we wave back again, for they are ours; they went out from our own households. Ours! Hail! Hail! Put off the black, and put on the white. Stop tolling the funeral bell and ring the wedding anthem. Shut up the hearse and take the chariot. Now, the ship comes around the great headland. Soon she will strike the wharf and we will go aboard her. Tears for ships going out. Laughter for ships coming in. Now she touches the wharf. Throw on the planks. Block not up that gangway with embracing long-lost friends, for you will have eternity of reunion. Stand back and give way until other millions come on! Farewell to sin! Farewell to struggle! Farewell to sickness! Farewell to death! All aboard for heaven!

A Widow's Pursuit

NEWS comes from Tunis, that the object to which an American woman devoted her life has been achieved. For six years she has relentlessly pursued the murderers of her husband, and has at last succeeded in having one man condemned to death and another sentenced to twenty years imprisonment. Seventeen other persons who were implicated were not caught, but were tried in their absence, and six were sentenced to death and eleven to long terms of imprisonment. The murdered man was the Marquis de Mores, who came to this country in 1880, and married the daughter of a New York banker. He went to North Dakota, and having purchased a ranch, devoted himself to the beef-packing industry. Failing to make a success of that speculation, he returned to Paris, where he became a leader in society, a noted musician, and a supporter of the notorious Boulanger. In 1896, he went to Africa, his object, it was stated at the time, being to organize a revolt in the Soudan against British rule. He never returned, and various stories of his end were circulated. There was no doubt that he was treacherously murdered by members of his own party; but there was a suspicion that the murder was instigated by French officials, who wished the Marquis out of the way. His widow offered a reward, and pressed her investigation with much perseverance, until eventually the two rabs were arrested who have now been condemned. The attempt to listen collusion on the French of officials failed, but it was almost certain to do, in a country which is subject to the French government. The result, unsatisfactory as it is, is a remarkable illustration of the tenacity and indomitable persistence of a loving woman, who could not rest until her husband's murderers were brought to justice. Love is not changed its character since the days of the wise king.

Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it (Cant. 8: 7).

Military Hero

A brief dispatch from the Military Academy at West Point reports an act of heroism which has had serious, and possibly, fatal results. A gun was being moved over a precipitous cliff, when one of the horses became fractious. A cadet as on the horse's back, and was in imminent danger of being thrown. Capt. Greble, the instructor in artillery tactics, noticed the cadet's peril, and ordered him to dismount. The cadet obeyed, and Capt. Greble himself immediately mounted the horse. Instantly the animal reared, and falling over the edge of the cliff, dragged the other horses in the team and the gun with it. Capt. Greble also, and the gun falling upon him broke both his legs and caused internal injuries. Capt. Greble did excellent service in Cuba as head of the Department of Charities and Corrections. In that office he carried through the charity system in the island, which ameliorated the condition not only of the poor, but of the hospital patients and the insane. His misfortune, therefore, will be deeply regretted in Cuba by the many people whom he helped. None can help admiring a man who, to save another, voluntarily incurs danger to himself, yet only too often the same people listen with indifference to the story of Him who, to save them from eternal death, gave Himself to humiliation and pain and death.

He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him and with his stripes we are healed (Isa. 53: 5).

The Legal Value of a Husband

An important decision by the New York Court of Appeals has just been handed down. It related to the death of a man who was killed in an accident on the Metropolitan Street Railway Company's line. He had been run over by a car, and had died from his injuries. The Company's lawyer in his defense tried to prove at the trial that the deceased was intoxicated when he was run over; but though he proved that the man did occasionally drink to excess, he was unable to show that he had been drinking when the closed their stores on the day of the funeral, and went to their synagogues to chant the funeral Psalms. The hearse was to make a tour of the streets, stopping five minutes before each synagogue. Jews from other parts of the city assembled to follow the hearse, until, according to a conservative estimate, fully fifty thousand were massed in Henry and the adjacent streets. When the coffin was brought out, there was a general rush toward it by persons desiring to touch it. The police forced the crowd back, but had some difficulty in clearing a way for the hearse. Passing down Grand street, on the way to the ferry, by which it was to go to the cemetery in Brooklyn, it had reached the block occupied by Hoe & Company's factory, when some boys from an upper window threw some cotton waste on the hearse. The mourners regarded the act as an insult to their dead, and made a rush for the factory. As they would not leave, a fire hose was turned on them, and police reserves from eleven precincts were summoned. They attacked the crowd with their customary brutality, and there was soon in a deserted hut that was built ten years ago, when an effort was being made to turn to commercial account the immense tract of salt which stretches fifteen miles across the desert. The traveler waited in the hut while the storm raged and finally resolved to spend the night there. Before lying down, however, he explored the interior. In one corner he came across a strange mound. Looking at it more closely he was horrified to find that it was the body of a man, lying as if peacefully asleep under a blanket. It was of alabaster whiteness, and even the clothing was perfectly white, like snow. When touched it was found to be perfectly encrusted with a salt deposit. It was identified as the body of a Swede, who disappeared several years ago. It is conjectured that he took shelter in the cabin and was frozen to death during a bitter night, and had not been found until the salt had completely encased his body. In a recess of the cabin the body of his burro was found in the same condition. The body of the man was decently interred and that of the burro has been sent to the Smithsonian Institute. Sceptics who have taken a delight in ridiculing the Scripture story of Lot's wife (Gen. 19: 26) may well take notice of this modern instance of a similar fatality. There is no evidence that this case was a judgment for such sin as her's, but when such sin is committed and men who have been saved turn again to the world, there seems to come over them a change of nature, of which her condition was a type, and they are no longer susceptible to spiritual influence.

If, after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning (II. Peter 2: 20).

BRIEF NOTES

The Methodist Church in the Philippines has already enrolled 352 communicants, while hundreds more are requesting baptism.

In Japan, the Protestant missionaries of all grades number 782, an increase of 25; the Greek Church membership is 26,680, the Roman Catholic, 55,824.

accident occurred. The Court therefore gave the widow damages, estimating the amount on the basis of the deceased's earnings and the number of years he might have lived if he had not been killed. The Court of Appeals has reversed this judgment, on the ground that a man who had the habit of drinking would not have given his wife his earnings and would, besides, have been unlikely to live so long as a sober man. Young men especially should ponder this decision, which shows that a man with the drinking habit is not worth so much as an abstainer. This fact should influence even those who disregard Christ's warning:

Take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness (Luke 21: 34).

Riot at a Funeral

One of the most furious riots New York has seen in many years, occurred on July 30. An enormous crowd of Jews had collected in Henry street to witness the removal of the body of Chief Rabbi Joseph from his house to the hearse. He was the highest official in Orthodox Jewish circles in America, and was held in profound veneration. The East Side Jews a desperate fight, the police using their night sticks and the crowd throwing stones at them and the factory windows. About a hundred persons were severely hurt before the riot was quelled. The damage to the factory from broken windows is estimated at $1,500. It would have been much greater if the Jews, infuriated by the insult, had reached the upper floors of the building. Inquiries made since the outbreak elicit the fact, that has long been suspected, that in certain quarters there is an intense race prejudice against the Jews, which led to the conflict. It is sad to think that even in this free and enlightened land, as in Russia, France and Germany, this intense hatred should survive against this afflicted people, and that after so many generations wherever they are found they still have cause to repeat the words of the Psalmist:

Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us (Ps. 44: 13).

GOLDEN TEXT -- PSALM 40: 4:
"BLESSED IS THAT MAN THAT MAKETH THE LORD HIS TRUST"

The Lesson Story

THE Israelites have almost within grasp the land which God promised to give to them when he brought them out of Egypt. They have come to Kadesh-Barnea, on the very border of the Promised Land. It is a beautiful spot, an oasis in the desert through which they have been traveling. They are encamped in the midst of green hills, flowing streams and wells of water. Surely it is a place for sweet content, and thankfulness to God that he has brought them through the long and weary way, for it is nearly a year and a half since they left Egypt. Expectation is running high, for their journeyings seem almost at an end. But then as now, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." But it is not God who makes the slip. It is always man.

We can almost hear Moses saying to the people, "Ye are come to the mountains of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give us. Behold the Lord, thy God, hath set the land before thee; go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged." But the people are afraid, and they ask Moses to send a party of men ahead that they may see just what the dangers are, and come back and tell them before they shall make a start. Twelve men are accordingly appointed by Moses to spy out the land. They divide into two companies, one to go throughout the whole length of the land, even to the mountains of Syria. Joshua is of this company. Caleb belongs to the other company, that is to penetrate only about one hundred miles, but into what is considered a very dangerous part of the country. Caleb's party is the first to return. They have something to show for their journey, a great cluster of grapes, which probably weighs from twenty to twenty-five pounds, with grapes as large as plums, and many of them, such grapes and such clusters as may sometimes be seen in Greece and in California and elsewhere to-day. They bring this great cluster into the encampment, suspended on a pole between two men, who are carrying it. Only so could they bring it so far unbroken. It is not necessary to suppose it was too heavy for one to carry, as often pictured equal in size to the men who carry it. Held by one in his hand, its grapes would be knocked off by striking the body. The hopes of the people go up, up, as they are told about the wonderful fruits and the flowing streams of water that abound everywhere. But their hopes go down, down, when they are told that the grapes belong to the vineyards of giants, whom they will have to fight. Caleb alone of this company is not afraid. He says to the people, "Dread not, neither be afraid of them, for the Lord, your God, which goeth before you, he shall fight for you." And Caleb reminds them how God has already fought for them, and delivered them from the Egyptians. But the people are still afraid, and even wish themselves back in Egypt.

And now the other exploring party returns. Among them Joshua is the one brave man. He joins Caleb in trying to persuade the people that God is able to make them conquerors. They are not persuaded, but instead they stone Caleb and Joshua. God is near, and hears their angry words, and sees their stoning. His voice is heard in the Tabernacle, calling for Moses to come and talk with him. And what is God saying to Moses? That he will no longer have the Israelites for his people. But Moses prays God not to cast them off. And for Moses' sake God promises that he will still be their Helper, but he declares that only two who are now men shall ever live in the Land of Promise, namely, Caleb and Joshua, who are thus rewarded for their faith that cast out fear, and for trying to encourage the people to go forward. God's purpose is to keep all others of that generation out of the Land of Promise, until the children are grown to be men and women, and the fathers and mothers are dead. The people, on hearing this, exclaim: "We will go up ourselves, without God." And they did try to go, but as God is not with them to help them, thousands upon thousands are killed by the giants, whom they need not have feared if they had trusted God at first.

Illustration and Application

1. The Promised Land foretold.
2. The Promised Land surveyed.
3. The Promised Land abandoned.

God first promised the land to Abraham, whose exodus from Chaldea has instructive points of resemblance and contrast to the later exodus of his children from Egypt. Chaldea, like Egypt, was a land of education, but also of idolatry, and so a place to emigrate from. Better a good moral environment in a rough country, than a home among refined but godless people. There were probably five hundred persons in Abraham's caravan, but two millions in the great host of his descendants that Moses led to the same land of Canaan. In both cases, there are long delays for moral preparation. When Abraham was at last in the land, and had given Lot, his nephew, the first choice of location, which that selfish nephew had accepted and moved his family to the fertile truck farms at the gate of Sodom, then it was God told Abraham that all the land, so far as his eye could see, should be the possession of his many children, who were to be like the stars for multitude—a wonderful promise, for he then had neither land nor child (Gen. 12: 14-17; 15: 18-21). This promise was repeated again and again to Moses (Exod. 3: 7-9; 17: 13; 5: 23; 31).

See the land . . . and be ye of good courage (Num. 13: 18, 20). Moses bade the people count the cost, and at the same time exhorted them to courage. If they had been men of the highest faith, they would have gone right into the land to take immediate possession, not caring to see anything in advance but the promise of God, content that he had seen all else, including the difficulties, which he had promised they should overcome.

Promises Tested and Promises Trusted When they hesitated, Moses said in substance, Face the obstacles, but fear not. One leading man from each tribe entered the land to investigate. Ten out of twelve brought back a discouraging report. They found "a land flowing with milk and honey," just as God had said they would. They should have taken that fulfillment of one promise as an assurance that the next promise of conquest would also be fulfilled. God's fulfillment of his promise for to-day should be sufficient assurance that he will not forget his promise for to-morrow. The grapes were according to his word. Why should they doubt the giants would be as pow-promise their watchword of advance, their talk was leaden with the "nevertheless" and "moreover" and "but" and "not able" of unbelief. Not less a sin is it for preachers and teachers to-day to lead in the retreats of unbelief and discouragement! Let leaders lead or leave.

The spies who knew all the difficulties, but no path to success, remind us by contrast of a pilot who came on board a stranded Mississippi steamer. "Are you a pilot?" asked the captain. "Well, they call me one," said the rough sailor. "Do you know where the snags and bars are?" "No, sir." "Well, then, how do you expect to pilot me?" "I know where they are not." Let us not hunt snags, but be content to follow the wide, deep channel God has provided for our voyage of life.

We are well able to overcome it (v. 30). So spoke the two spies, who were men of faith, Joshua and Caleb. In all ages and in all departments of life it is such men who are crowned victors; men who believe in God and in themselves, and obey God without asking questions. To the whisper of little faith, "We are not able," they shout back, as they glance upward, "He is able." They understand how "our weakness is completeness in another's greater strength."

Giants we all have to fight to-day, and it is the spirit of Joshua and Caleb that will enable us to conquer them without and within, our tempers and our surroundings alike. What a picture is that of sturdy manhood when, in later years, Caleb entered the Land of Promise, and was given first choice of the land. He is old now and might fairly leave the fighting to younger men, while he takes some fat valley free of foes. But he chooses a mountain full of giants that he must conquer. And he drives them out and makes that mountain one of the world's most sacred places, Hebron (Josh. 14: 12-15). We know yet more fully the courage of Joshua, the conqueror of the whole land. Such was the mature age of the two men who in young manhood faced giants and were not afraid, because they also faced God.

Let us not lose the very practical thought that lies in the fact that these two noble characters were "spies." It is amazing how bad boys and bad men have brought better boys and better men under the "hoodoo" of the unreasoning prejudice against "spies," when it is a case of morals rather than of war. Not long since the nation was startled by stories of unspeakable barbarities at West Point, under the name of hazing, which, under a false code of honor, the students felt must not be reported—though barbarous and criminal—not even by those who were injured for life. In nearly all schools, disobedience to school rules and even to the laws is thus shielded, and anyone who, like Hobson at Annapolis Naval Academy, reports these misdoings, is treated as worse than the criminal. Even as we write, news comes that buildings have been burned in the British Naval School by some of the cadets, and whole classes must be suspended, because none of them will "denounce" the outrage. That is a good word. It is not "tattling" to "denounce" wrongdoing. Only the spotted should rail about "spotters." Anthony Comstock, the brave defender of childhood against "cancer planters," is often times spoken of slightly even by men who have not felt his righteous blows; but under his very window stands a statue in honor of a revolutionary "spy," who died for his country. Major Andre has a like honor in Westminster Abbey. Not less brave than these two noble spies of the two sides in the Revolution; not less brave than Caleb and Joshua, are many of those who risk their lives among desperate men to detect and punish those who would corrupt our youth and trample on our laws.

But they presumed to go up (Numb. 14: 44). As with Esau, so here, they "found no place for repentance, though they sought it diligently with tears." They had refused to go when God would go with them, and now they determined to go even without him, only to find the giants too much for them when God fought not with them. "Because I called and ye refused, I will laugh at your calamity." There is a time when it is too late to repent, an unpardonable sin for which no mercy waits. Let us not disregard the Cross, God's call to mercy and to duty. In Scotland, Walter Scott reminds us, a burning cross was the signal for the clan to gather for battle, and it bore a curse to those who refused to respond:

When flits the cross from man to man,
Vich-Alpine's summons to his clan,
Burst be the ear that fails to heed!
Palsied the foot that shuns to speed!

"Faint heart never won a fair lady," or a fair land, or any thing else worth having.

O the tragedies of neglected opportunity
Gleanings "Seize the hour."

Majorities are not always right. At Kadesh-Barnea "the voice of the people" was not "the voice of God," but of doubt and fear and folly.

In every twelve "leaders" there is likely to be one or two who lead toward doubt and fear. Of the apostles one was a doubter, another a traitor. Let us not depend on human leaders, but follow God.

"A CLUSTER OF GRAPES, AND THEY BARE IT BETWEEN TWO UPON A STAFF"

erless as he had said? Why should they not see towering above the giants the Most High? Instead of measuring the giants against God, they measured themselves as "grasshoppers" beside the giants. Not so David in later years, when a boy, strong in faith, conquered the giant. Again in after years, Israel seemed like "two little flocks of kids" compared to their mighty foes, the Syrians, but God made the "kids" the victors (I. Kings 20: 26-29). A little boy in one of our churches, who had fully learned how the Israelites should have felt when they measured themselves by the giants, said in the children's meeting, "I am only one of the Lord's little grasshoppers, but he can help me to do a great deal. The vane on the Royal Exchange in London, supports a huge brass grasshopper. There lies behind this curious symbol the story of a babe abandoned by the roadside. While a carriage tarried to give children that were riding a chance for play, one of them chased a large grasshopper, and so came near the crying infant. The foundling was taken to the carriage, adopted as a son in the Gresham family, and subsequently, as Sir Thomas Gresham, founded the first Royal Exchange. Hence this grasshopper emblem. Israel's 'leading men' did not lead, even as 'grasshoppers,' to any good result. They led backward. They remembered the giants, but forgot God. When they should have made God's

WHO SHALL YIELD?

WHEN there comes, unhappily, a quarrel in a family, and bitter words are said, and personalities exchanged, there must follow, if the people are Christians and civilized, a feeling of deep regret, a hurt and lowered feeling, that must be the aftermath of a family dispute. For friends, understand, cannot quarrel without having the wound go deeper than any strife between enemies can possibly make, and kindred, being nearer than friends, must know a sharper pain. Family feuds are notoriously the hardest to compose, and we have the testimony of holy writ that "a brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city." The truth is, that while cannibals and heathen of the lowest order may be expected to devour one another, there is little excuse for bickering and hard feeling among those brought up in Christian homes and in Christian communities. Still, such evidences of the old Adam do sometimes lift up their Satanic heads. I once knew an instance in which a husband and wife did not directly address one another for fourteen years. The fracture of their mutual love was deep and wide, a gulf they would not bridge; yet they remained under the same roof, and bore the inconveniences of their attitude with what remnants of decorum they could patch together. "Jessie," the mother would say, "tell your father that the coal is out," and "James, tell your mother that a man is coming to-day to repair the windows in the third-story front room," would be the father's method of establishing communication.

Of all futile, foolish, inconceivably absurd positions to take, the one which makes a victim of ill-temper and vow never to speak to the person who has offended, is the least excusable. Why plunge into such embarrassment? Why lose so much dignity? Why be so silly? Granting, however, that some such mistake has been made, fancying that those making it are mother and daughter, or two sisters, or mother and daughter-in-law, how is the trouble to end? For clearly it cannot go on forever. Who shall speak first? Who shall yield first? Which shall take the initiative in procuring a reconciliation?

Plainly, it seems to me, that the one who most loves Christ and most dreads sin, will first put self aside, and trample upon pride, and do her best to make the estrangement a thing of the past. Very probably her overtures may be received coldly. It takes a large heart to forgive as well as to ask forgiveness. But if one does right, she may well leave the consequences with God. To most of us there comes hours in life when all we can do is to take the onward step that we are sure is right, and rest on the certainty that God will see to the rest.

In homes where families are made up of those who are, so to speak, collaterals, and not children and parents only, there may be lack of congeniality. Relations in law are often unharmonious. But it is the weak and unwise person who quarrels, who is quick to take umbrage at a tone or a word, or who quibbles about questions of no importance. We owe it to ourselves to be calm and gentle. We owe it to our Master to practice that divine charity which, bearing all things, hopeth all things, believeth all things, suffereth long, and envieth not, and that is notuffed up.

A Prayer of the Sixteenth Century

We beseech thee, O Lord, remember all for good. Have mercy upon all, O God. Remember every soul, who being in any affliction, trouble or agony, stands in need of thy mercy and help, all who are in necessity or distress, all who love, or hate us.

Thou, O Lord, art the Helper of the helpless, the Hope of the hopeless; the Saviour of them who are tossed with tempests; the Haven of them who sail; be Thou All to all the glorious majesty of the Lord our God be upon us; prosper Thou the work of our hands upon us; oh, prosper Thou our handywork. Lord, be Thou within me, to strengthen me; without me, to keep me; above me, to protect me; beneath me, to uphold me; before me, to direct me; behind me, to keep me from straying; round about me, to defend me. Blessed be Thou, O Lord, our Father, forever and ever.

There are words and crises when the lips falter and words will not come at our call. At such times, a printed prayer is a help. We may adopt its petitions as our own. Prayers are scattered through the Bible; many a text is a prayer. Hymns may be sung as prayers. In the language of a hymn, to the accompaniment of a sweet melody, our prayers may rise up to Him who dwells in the eternities, yet is our Father and Friend.

Crusty People.

Not bad people, simply crusty people. They would not lie, or steal, or defraud, or malign; they scorn vice, they are upright in their dealings, and honorable in their lives. But oh, how snappish, how cross to the children, how hateful, how hard to get on with! Sometimes they sulk, and you wonder what you have done to offend them. Sometimes they storm, and you wish yourself a hundred miles away. Sometimes they say disagreeable things before company, and the company fidgets and does not know where to look. Sometimes they make you speak several times, pretending they do not hear you. They are crusty, they blight the home, they ruin their own peace, and that of everybody around; they are like an untimely frost. For crusty people

EVENTIDE

O'er wave and shore the twilight falls, the golden sunset softly broods,
A radiance as from jasper walls enfolds the evening's solitudes.
Ah! love of mine, so far away, I long for thee at fall of day.

there is no excuse. One may govern words and looks if he chooses. One may refrain from needless rudeness. One may cultivate that gentle altruism which makes politeness habitual. And if one happen to be born with an infirmity of temper, one may ask God's help to overcome the evil and seek the good.

The Family Picnic

I think the Saturday half holiday, now so general, is a very good time to have a family picnic. You need not start for the beach or the park until four o'clock, and so you will avoid the earlier heat and escape the earlier crowds. Take all the children. Prepare a simple luncheon, with plenty of sandwiches, hard-boiled eggs and gingerbread. Cut the bread very thin and remove the crust. Butter and spread with finely chopped or minced ham or beef; or, if you choose, make a cheese sandwich. Bread and cheese makes a very good luncheon, if you have nothing else. Take a bottle of cold coffee or tea, and if you can manage it, buy milk for the children after you reach the picnic place. If you go to the shore, let them romp in the sand and run races with the waves. If in the park, find a place where there is no prohibition against tumbling on the grass.

This sort of family picnic on Saturday, is a very good preparation for the Sabbath Day.

THE HONEY-BIRD

THE honey-bird, my children, lives far and far away,
Where burning suns are blazing through Afric's tropic day.

There, deep in sombre forests are colonies of bees,
That hive their golden honey in hearts of hollow trees.

The hunters seek to find it, their eyes are keen and bright;
Their forms are lithe and agile, their shoeless feet are light.

But they might seek forever, forever and a day,
Unless to show the honey a bird should lead the way.

A cheerful bird that flashes, with sudden arrow-flight;
And then, returning, utters a cry of rare delight.

A merry Follow, Follow, as who should clearly say,
"The bees and I are neighbors, and I can tell the way."

That ringing Follow, Follow, allures the hunters on,
Until their quest rewarded, the nectar-feast is won.

Which hath the better office is not quite plain to me:
The bird that pioneereth; the honey-making bee;

We cannot all make honey, but some may find it out,
And show its hive to others, a gracious thing, no doubt.

And in this world of thickets and tangles, if you please,
One likes to know the birds, who are neighbors to the bees.

When John Proposes

TO the average young woman of good bringing up and common sense, a proposal should not come as a surprise. If a girl does not intend to marry the man who is paying her very flattering attentions, she should so bear herself that he will withdraw them, without feeling hurt, and that he shall not have the mortification of offering himself and meeting with a refusal. In most cases, a young lady is perfectly aware that a young man admires her, and if the admiration has deepened to love, she also knows that.

When John proposes, not as the swains used to do in romantic novels, by falling on his knees before the lady of his love, but by saying, in a matter of fact way, "Maria, will you one of these days be my wife?" Maria should be resolved upon her answer. If it is yes, then she should determine that she will be true to John through absence and distance, evil and good report, and whatever may happen. If John goes to Denver and she remains in New York, she must not fall in love with John's friend while he is away. Fickle girls do that. One of them wrote to Aunt Patience not long ago: "I thought I was devoted to Jack," she said, "but Jack has been gone a year; he is in the Philippines. His image seems to fade away. I cannot make him real. I have been going out with Harry, and I do believe that Harry is the one I love." Poor, foolish incapable. She didn't love either. She simply enjoyed courtship. Often when John proposes, Maria temporizes. She asks for more time; declares she is not sure of her own mind, and behaves like an idiot. If John, properly amazed, agrees to her proposition, that she shall be free, while he is virtually bound, and that there shall be neither meetings nor correspondence between them; just goes away and leaves my lady alone, she will, after a time, discover that he is dear to her. By that time his fancy may have been attracted elsewhere, and he may wish to break his fetters.

Please, young lovers, remember that love is not play, nor marriage a pastime. Marrying is more serious than burying, though you do not think so. Be honorable, be courageous, be unselfish, and if your house of love is not to be erected on the shifting sand, ask God's blessing on the initial step. Do not take so immensely important a step as proposing, or as accepting a proposal, without prayer for guidance. And, once the matter is settled, have a short engagement.

"Jenny," said a good gentleman, forty years ago, entering the kitchen where Jenny, with her apron on, sat shelling peas, "do you think you can marry me?"

"Yes, Rob," was the answer. "Then, dear, take off your apron and come along. We'll step across the street to the minister's and be married." And so they were.

FRATERNAL OBLIGATION

DR. P. S. HENSON, HANSON PLACE BAPTIST CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

CHRISTIANITY alone can establish true fraternity. Obligation is based upon relationship and opportunity. As I have ability and opportunity I am bound to do good to all men, for all men are my brothers. It behooves me to have regard to their material conditions and in this regard our gracious Master set the pace, for he ministered continually, not only to the spiritual, but the corporal needs of men, and through their bodies sought to reach and save their souls. For myself I have not a particle of confidence in those transcendental pietists who are so absorbed in stargazing that they cannot see Lazarus lying at the gate, or in those sanctimonious priests and Levites who are in such haste to reach a religious conventicle up at Jerusalem that they leave a poor, half dead mortal to perish by the roadside. Not that we are by blind benefactions to put a premium upon good-for-nothingness. Not that lazy drones are to subsist upon public charity, for God himself has expressly ordained that if a man will not work he shall not be allowed to eat. But I must see to it, if possible, that if he wants to work he shall have a chance to work. And every church in a great city ought to have a labor bureau in connection with it, through whose agency provision might be made for willing hands to feed hungry mouths. I am not only under obligation to provide employment for my poor brother, if that be possible, but if I employ him I am bound to beware of taking advantage of his necessities and grinding him down to starvation wages that I may fatten on the profits of his toil. I may not, I dare not ever forget that my employee is my brother. And if by reason of adversity he be brought to destitution I must see to it that he does not starve or lack for ministrations, even though his straitened circumstances be due to faults that he should have remedied. All of us by reason of our sins are in a pitiful plight before the Lord, but he does not upon that account utterly abandon us, nor must we abandon one another, but be like the heavenly Father, who sends the rain and sunshine both on the evil and the good.

A COMMON MISTAKE

REV. J. H. JOWETT, CARRS LANE CHAPEL, BIRMINGHAM, ENG.

MANY young people are kept away from Christ by the belief that the first step is to have a deep consciousness of sin, and this they have not felt. This strong sense of sin is a Christian growth; it is a work of grace, and only deepens with our progress in the Christian life. Those who have advanced the furthest in Christian growth are the most conscious of their defects. And this principle holds good in every sphere of life. Where would you go to find the man most conscious of his ignorance? Would you go amongst the unprivileged, amongst people who have never been to school or had no education or training, who cannot spell out the meaning of words, to whom the whole domain of literature is a sealed book? No. You would go, or ought to go, among those who have had every advantage of school, college or university, and have used their advantages to the full, who have gone furthest in exploration of the unknown, who are called by their countrymen learned. You would find out the most prominent of them, and there among the leaders of our learned men, you would find the deepest consciousness of ignorance. They who know most are the most conscious how little they do know. It is among learned men that you will find the deepest sense of ignorance, and it is among the saintliest men that you will find the deepest sense of sin. This deep feeling of sin will only come as a result of your own Christian growth; you must not expect it at the outset of your entrance into the Christian life. As you grow in Christ you will grow in spiritual sensitiveness, and you will recoil from much from which now you do not turn with any feelings of revulsion.

CURING MONOTONY

DR. ALEXANDER M'LAREN, MANCHESTER, ENG.

I KNOW only one infallible way of preventing the common from becoming commonplace, of preventing the small from becoming trivial, of preventing the familiar from becoming contemptible, and it is to link it all to Jesus Christ and to say, "For thy sake, and unto thee, I do this;" then not only will the rough places become plain and the crooked things straight, and not only will the mountains be brought low, but the valleys of the commonplace will be exalted. "Thy steps shall not be straitened." "I will make his feet as hind's feet," says one of the old prophets. What a picture of light, buoyant, graceful movement that is! And each of us may have that, instead of the grind, grind, tramp, tramp, tramp, along the level and commonplace road of our daily lives, if we will. Walk in the path of Christ, toward Christ, and "thy steps shall not be straitened."

NATIONAL OBLIGATIONS

DR. W. P. GEORGE, WESTMINSTER CHURCH, KANSAS CITY, MO.

BY the triumph of our national arms, we became Spain's residuary legatee among the nations, and like a ripe pear, the Philippines fell into our lap. Before this had entered into the sphere of politics and immediately after Dewey's magnificent victory, I called attention to the fact that no other course except annexation was compatible with our duty, either to God or to other nations. Other courses were open. We could have relegated them to Spanish rule, traded them off for other possessions, or left their inhabitants to themselves. If the latter course had been adopted, it must have led to international complications. Germany, Japan, Russia and Great Britain would each have desired to pluck the fruit, but it then seemed to me and so seems now that when all these powers were struggling for supremacy in the Far East, the Lord called to America, his Benjamin in the family of nations, to take our rightful place in the vanguard and to do our part in civilizing and Christianizing these people. He gave to us the key of the Oriental position. The fruit of our action was speedily seen in 1900, when one of the greatest of the world's statesmen, John Hay, took the lead in the Chinese complications, and was mainly instrumental in keeping that country open for the commerce and Christianity of the world.

STRENGTH OF CHARACTER

DR. J. F. CARSON, CENTRAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN

STRENGTH is the glory of manhood. Virtue is strength. It is the concentration of manhood against vice. Truth is strength. It is the concentration of mind against all that is false and untrue. Duty is strength. It is the focusing of power on service. Decision is strength. It is the application of mind and will to meet the crisis. Tenderness is strength. It is the concentration of force in sympathy. Faith is strength. It is centering the whole being upon God. These six—virtue, truth, duty, decision, tenderness, faith—are the qualities of a strong man. The ideal of this manhood is Jesus Christ. And he is the inspiration of these virtues. Study the men whose lives have been virtuous and truthful, and faithful, and decided and tender and true to God, and you will find that they are men who have been indwelt by Jesus Christ. It is Christ that marches through the centuries in the lives of the noble personalities that have made human history sublime. Let the Christ enter into your being. Behold as in a mirror the glory of the Lord and you will be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, and you will become such a one that as Jesus' custom was so shall yours be in all virtue, truth, duty, decision, tenderness and faith.

DR. J. F. CARSON,

MAN'S PLACE IN THE UNIVERSE

REV. A. MCGAFFIN, SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

THE fact which redeems man from apparent insignificance in time and space, which crowns him with dignity and honor, is that he is God's one and only companion in all the world. The heavens, sun, moon and stars; the earth, hill, torrent and storm are the work of God's "fingers"; but thou and I are the offspring of his love, the children of his heart, the images of his mind and will. He cannot commune with suns or stars or storms. If the doctrine of the Holy Trinity means anything, it means that to the infinite Spirit communion, friendship, comradeship, are as essential as to us. And he wants us; us, mind you, frail as we are; sinful and shameful as we are, just as we are; and he comes for us, absorbed in us more than in anything else in space and time, and he yearns after us with jealous envy that we be his, wholly his. This is what gives to human life and the human spirit its crowning glory and honor. It is not by our physical affinities, by our bulk and weight, that we are to measure ourselves. If we thus gauge our worth we are only the small, neglected dust of the balance, inconsiderable in the hugeness of things. It is not, either, that merely physical things and laws have been willed to us and put in subjection under our feet. We know that, we feel it, we have proved it, though we have but wearily won our way to man's present masterful power over nature. The crowning glory and honor of humankind is its spiritual affinity with God. He has set these mere things to go by clockwork. He has come visiting us by the pang of conscience, by the judgments of reason, by the emotions of our hearts to win us into harmonious friendship with himself. What Jesus was as man, the beloved Son of God, in whom God was glad, we all may begin to be. God values us highly, and will build up the ruin, remold the marred image and crown us with glory if we will only seek his friendship as he has sought ours. He speaks to us, saying: "I have come to seek and save you; be my friend and I will make thee the king thou hast in thee to be."

POWER IN PRAYER

DR. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, MARBLE COLLEGIATE CHURCH, NEW YORK

WHAT is prayer? The secret of its life is the filial spirit: "When ye pray say, Our Father." The great argument runs on this wise: "If earthly parents know how to give good gifts unto their children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give good things to them that love him?" All the elements of true prayer flow out of this filial spirit. The petitioner, who has the filial spirit, will consent that God shall answer in his own time and way. It is quite possible that God may keep him waiting for a time; or that in his superior wisdom he may determine to answer not precisely as the petitioner had hoped, but in some other and better way. A true child of God will gladly acquiesce in this. I do not say submit, but acquiesce. "Submit" is a meagre, grudging word. The Father loves us and knows what is best for us. We know not what to pray for as we ought. The key to the situation is to abide in Christ. Not less than ten times in his farewell address to his disciples did he say "Abide in me." It is related in the mythology of the Greeks that Antæus, a son of Earth, was immortal so long as he was in contact with the earth. His enemy, Hercules, slew him only when he lifted him from the earth and held him high in the air. We can claim the advantage of prevailing power at the mercy-seat only when we are in vital contact with Christ "who is our life."

THE SOURCE OF PROGRESS

DR. WILLIAM CAVEN, KNOX COLLEGE, TORONTO

ALL true increase of knowledge in divine things attainable in the present life must come from, or be intimately associated with, the more perfect understanding of Scripture; and we do not doubt that even in this twentieth century new light shall break forth from the Word of God. We do not look for any interpretations which shall demand fundamental revision of the doctrines which the Church of God has always acknowledged. Increase of light will but make these a surer possession. But new and edifying aspects and applications of these doctrines may come distinctly into the consciousness of the Church, making them still more fruitful in spiritual results. Looking at the theoretical side of divine truth, we may also say that progress in theological science is still possible—progress in the construction of the doctrinal system. But let us never doubt that all real advance, whether in the theoretical or practical apprehension of Christian doctrine, will be—must be—through the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

SELF-MADE HINDRANCES

REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, EAST NORTHFIELD, MASS.

WE know that if a man will have life, he may, from Christ; if a man desire that that evil within him, which we speak of as sin, should be cured, Christ will do it. And yet the words of Jesus, spoken to the disciples, have all their old force and all their old necessity of utterance: "Strive to enter in by the narrow door."

How should we reconcile these apparently contradictory positions? It may be done in a very few words. God has nothing more to do for your salvation; pardon is provided for your sin; purity so positive as to overcome all your impurity, power perfectly sufficient for the enabling of the most paralyzed soul in this house. All this is ready; and yet there are men and women here who will never find the pardon or share the purity or feel the power until they have come to a point of definite strenuous strife. God has opened the door, but men have built in the open doorway hindrances of their own. It is against these that men have to strive.

Jesus says there will be many who will strive to enter in and will not be able. May I not be one of them? Certainly not. I pray you mark distinctly what the Lord says. He says to these men: "Strive to enter in." And it is so necessary that you strive. It is so urgent that you strive. Why? Because many will strive and will not be able when once the Master of the house has shut the door. He has not done it yet. Will you strive? Will you gather up your manhood, your womanhood, for strife; and though the way be thorny, tramp it; and though the burden appear too heavy to be borne, bend and lift it; and though the cross over shadow thee, stretch thy hands upon it for crucifixion unto life! Strive to enter in.

FREEDOM FOR SERVICE

Concentration of Effort Essential for Spiritual Development

EVERY one who has undertaken an important work, has discovered how easily he may fail in it, if his attention is diverted to other matters. There are many things he would like to do, many things that need doing, but he soon learns that only by concentrating all his thoughts and energies in one direction, can he succeed in the main object he has set before himself. Dr. Jay used to tell a story of a young man who, in the old coaching days, occupied the seat on the top of a coach next to the driver. As they drove along, he asked the coachman who lived in one of the mansions they passed. The coachman did not know. He wanted to know what was made in a certain factory, what was the value of land, and numberless other inquiries, but to all the coachman replied that he did not know. "What do you know?" the young man asked, with some impatience. "I know how to drive," was the prompt reply. That was his business, and it was better for the safety of his passengers that he should know that one thing well, than know it imperfectly and have other kinds of knowledge. So it is in other pursuits. The one thing that we set ourselves to do should be done thoroughly and other matters, interesting and fascinating though they may be, must be let alone.

Such a rule involves the question which every man ought to consider at the very outset of his career, whether the object he sets before him is worth so much that it will pay him to sacrifice every other pursuit to that one. If he is not sure of that, he had better seek some other object. The figure used in the passage associated

FAITH'S FAILURE

The Promises of God Forgotten in the Presence of the Enemy

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHAT a picture of many of God's children in the present day, was the conduct of the spies who were sent to examine the Promised Land (Deut. 1:19-46). There are people now who are always magnifying their difficulties, instead of glorying in the opportunity they afford to trust God, who fighteth for them! The people were strong, the cities fenced and very great, and the giant children of Anak were there (vers. 28, 29). "But Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it" (ver. 30). But the ten spies contradicted him and said: "We are not able to go up against the people, for they are stronger than we" (ver. 31). They spoke the truth, and Caleb spoke the truth; but they measured only themselves and their own resources against the people of the land. Caleb trusted in the Lord and in his Word, and, counting that God was for them, he said, "We are able" (Num. 13:27-31, R.V.), for "with God all things are possible." The people were indeed stronger than they, but God was stronger still.

So the ten spies brought up an evil report of the land which they had spied to the children of Israel. "And all the congregation lifted up their voice and cried, and the people wept that night." Why? Because they accepted the testimony, and came under the influence of the ten spies, who looked at everything, and spoke accordingly, as though God had never chosen Israel, never delivered them, and never made them promises which were enough to utterly reassure them at this time. Those who write and speak as though natural law were the dominant power in the universe, and who ignore God, are the popular writers and speakers in our own day. They know that if he is the living God, then they are responsible to believe with the Topic (Hebrews 12:1) is easily understood. It is that of the racer, whose one object is to be first at the goal. He casts aside everything that would hinder him in attaining that ambition. The trainer would tell him what those weights were. There would be nothing wrong in his indulging in a feast, but if he has made his success as a racer his chief object, feasts are not for him. He must live abstemiously, and eat only the foods that will go to muscle, not to flesh. There are other pleasures that are quite innocent, and he has no words of condemnation for those who enjoy them, but if they interfere with his training, he avoids them.

The lesson of all this is obvious. The man who sets himself to attain the highest spiritual development must make sacrifices. What the athlete will do to fit himself to win the prize, the Christian who desires to reach the heights which God has set before him, may well do. It is an incorruptible crown that he hopes to win, and all other achievements are poor in comparison. Young converts often ask, "May I not go to the theatre, or to dancing parties? Is it wrong to play a quiet game at cards?" and many similar questions. The answer is simple. If these things are weights, if they interfere with spiritual progress, they should be cast aside. So in the associations of friendship. An acquaintance may become a weight. There may be no harm in cultivating the friendship of some congenial associate, but if the effect of an hour spent in that society is to inspire a distaste for spiritual study and a disinclination for religious occupation, it is a weight to be cast aside. That is for the Christian who has the holy ambition of winning in the spiritual race. To men who are content with barely entering the kingdom, who desire just safety and no more, these considerations do not matter. It is for those who are seeking the highest development, who are striving to become Christlike, that the question of impediments becomes important. To such men every weight, whether in business or pleasure, is a serious matter, which must be cast aside at any price.

in and to obey him. This involves confession and renunciation of sin, and this, man in general, utterly repudiates. Natural law reaches the understanding, but the Word of God is "a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart" (Heb. 4:12).

The children of Israel murmured, and went farther in the wicked things they said than ever before, and God took them at their word. "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! Or would God we had died in this wilderness" (Num. 14:1, 2). Poor, miserable, people! There did die in the wilderness every adult among them. On the borders of the land of promise, their every meal a miraculous provision of bread from heaven, the manifest presence of God among them, a fact by day and by night—they yet speak of making a captain and returning to Egypt, their house of bondage! Moses and Aaron—for Aaron was now restored, and could take the place of intercessor by the side of Moses—fell upon their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel (ver. 5). The silent act was a speaking testimony to the rebellious people who made light of their holy God. Caleb and Joshua, the two faithful spies, rent their clothes and remonstrated with the people, urging them not to fear the people of the land. "They are bread for us," they said, "their defence is removed from over them, and the Lord is with us; fear them not. But all the congregation bade stone them with stones."

And now Another intervened. "The glory of the Lord appeared in the tent of meeting, unto all the children of Israel," and once again (see Ex. 32:7-14) God spoke to Moses of destroying the people, and making of him a great nation. There had been failure in Moses, and now the same test is applied to him as was applied before these failures in faith and meekness had taken place. God would show that the heart of Moses was right all the time, and that he could be justified in saying of him in the New Testament: "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:27). Again Moses refused to profit by his people's failure; again he looked at the matter in the light of how it touched his God (vers. 13-19).

BITTER were the words the sick man uttered in the frenzy that long brooding had developed in his mind. His wife, knowing how much Immanuel had done for them, grew impatient.

The woman started forward, but stopped short with the words of expostulation half uttered. "Something has happened," she whispered, and stood listening, her head thrust from the half-open door.

A short word, reiterated again and again in a chorus of shrill voices, reached them as they waited. It was drowned in the thunder of trampling feet which shook the staircase. Screams, yells, cries of panic and fear mingled in the tumult. The woman added a piercing note to the uproar and darted away.

"It's fire," observed the man on the cot composedly. "She's gone to look for the children." He showed his yellow teeth in a terrible smile. "Maybe there won't be so much difference betwixt us inside of an hour."

"I must get you out of this," cried Immanuel, and stooped to lift him to his feet. "No. I won't," screamed the man. "I'll burn here where I've suffered the torments of the lost, an' you, millionaire as you are, shall burn with me."

The man was manifestly crazy; fever blazed red in his cheeks, his eyes glittered with murderous hate. Immanuel lifted the gaunt figure as one would lift a child and stepped with his burden into the dark hallway.

A gleam of light guided him to an open door further down the passage. His feet slipped in the contents of an overturned washtub, but blessed air mingled with the choking smoke. A few steps further and he had reached a window; it gave upon a balcony which he took to be a fire-escape. Amid the indescribable litter of rubbish which loaded it down a woman squatted in seeming indifference, three children clinging to her shoulders.

"Why don't you get out of this?" shouted Immanuel in her ear.

She turned with a start and pointed down into the tangle of clothes lines loaded with fluttering rags which swayed back and forth in the murky air; red tongues of fire were thrusting themselves out of the billowing smoke below. Immanuel fell to pulling the boxes and barrels aside with frantic haste, in his search for the opening. The consumptive laughed aloud. "This ain't no fire-escape," he whispered, "it's a nice, airy balcony; the escapes is at the other end."

Another fight with the smothering smoke; this time with the two smallest children in his arms; the sick man, galvanized into sudden life at sight of the flames, followed close at his heels. Past innumerable doorways, where pale gleams of daylight fought with the billowing smoke; past air-shafts which now roared like great chimneys; past the useless pumps. The woman was in the lead now, she knew the place. They came suddenly upon a little group of silent figures crowded about a narrow window.

Immanuel forced his way to the window and sprang out. Low-voiced denunciation and cries of shame followed him. He flung out his hand in a gesture of denial. "I'll save you if I can!" he cried. They stared at him dully, and again lapsed into silence.

Crowded edgewise into what had once been an open yard, stood a squat building, its roof barely a foot above the iron balcony where he was standing. This building was as yet untouched by the fire.

The firemen were at work, but not one was visible. He shouted again and again; the swish and swirl of the battling waters drowned his voice. The iron balcony was growing hot beneath his feet; the wall to which it was fastened trembled ominously. He measured the space between the spot where he was standing and the roof opposite. He could jump across and save himself. The animal within clamored for this one chance of safety; the spirit in him heard the frightened wail of a child.

With a word to the man Stark, who stood beside him, he flung himself outward from the edge of the fire-escape, his feet locked firmly within the rail. His hands caught at—clutched the edge of the gutter opposite; his body wavered, sank downward, then stiffened into a living bridge between the two buildings.

"Quick now!" he shouted. And one of the women—there were three of them—crawled out upon his tense body, clutching, slipping, shrieking in his bursting ears, but gaining at last the safe level of the roof. Obeying the hoarse shouts of the consumptive she reached for a child which another thrust out as far as she was able on the body of Immanuel.

It was scarce ten minutes before all were over, but it seemed an eternity of agony to the man who hung there. He thought of the Christ on the Cross, and his failing muscles grew tense again. "He saved others," he muttered, "himself he could not—". His straining eyeballs stared into whirling clouds of vapor shot through with unearthly light; wailing voices sounded in his ears, frantic hands clutched at him. He felt his rigid fingers relaxing one by one. He was falling into soundless depths of night and oblivion.

Chap. XL.—Resurrection

HE opened his eyes upon white walls flooded with the pink light of dawn. Behind him lay the dark reaches of the Valley of the Shadow, through which he had toiled in the dark all unknowing. The rosy splendor trembled and wavered as it mounted, inch by inch, in tiny ripples toward the ceiling. He gazed at it unthinkingly, the dreams of the past night crowding in upon him. Strange dreams they were, and terrible, but already so vague and remote, so merged in the drowsy peace of this new awakening, that he smiled at the light like a little child. The slight rustling of draperies, and the sound of a hushed foot on the floor did not rouse him. He was thinking now, with the curious distinctness of a picture he had once seen of the resurrection morning. It represented Christ in the rock-cut tomb, the Saviour who had given his life for a lost world, swathed hand and foot in odorless linen, immovable, but with stirrings on the face of the life more abundant, while the pink light of dawn rippled on gray walls.

He pondered over this recollection of the picture, his eyes clearing at last. "Hilda!" he cried.

"Hush!" she made answer, "you are to swallow this and sleep."

He obeyed, his eyes dwelling confusedly on the round arms and shoulders gleaming white through diaphanous folds of pink muslin. He remembered now. The wind rustling through the wide branches of the hickories was sweet with the breath of clover blooms; high overhead a thrush sang softly.

Dreams again, cloudy and confused, with brief awakenings when he swallowed obediently what was put to his lips, and all the while he was gazing at the Christ bound hand and foot in his grave-clothes—immovable, with angels waiting at his head and feet.

One morning he awoke and the will to move and raise himself came back. The memory of the picture had faded, yet he could not lift a finger; he was bound hand and foot like the Christ of the painting. He groaned aloud and opened his eyes, not upon the pale sweet faces of waiting angels, but upon a bearded man, who stood gazing down at him with a pleased expression on his face.

He knew the man and spoke to him, "Why am I here?" he asked. "What has happened?"

"This has happened, Mr. Rossi," said the doctor softly: "you have made a splendid fight for life and you have won."

LEARN HOW

To Feed Yourself Skillfully.

It is easy to use good food and get well and keep that way, but a person must go about it. A lady says, "I had a dreadful time of it before I learned how to feed myself properly. I suffered with stomach trouble for about ten years and finally got so bad that terrible pains would set in, followed by nauseating sickness in the stomach and bowels."

Sometimes I would bloat up and would have to lie flat on my back. My stomach finally got so bad that it would throw up everything I ate and, of course, I lost weight and strength very rapidly. I became pale. Blood was out of order and I looked like a skeleton finally.

One day neuralgia set in in the stomach and liver and I went right down to death's door. I got so bad that even warm water was thrown off the stomach, which would hold absolutely nothing until I began taking Grape-Nuts in small quantities.

My father had been accustomed to Grape-Nuts and knew of the value of the food and began giving it to me. I immediately began to improve, and the stomach retained the food and digested it. I gradually grew well again and now I can eat a hearty dinner of almost anything. I have gained thirty pounds in weight. My brain is clear, skin beautifully white, and my eyes as bright as crystal, where I used to be sallow and with lack luster eyes. I owe everything to Grape-Nuts. Please do not publish my name." THE NEEDLE'S EYE

"But I wish to get up and I cannot move," said Immanuel, searching languidly for a key to the man's words. "And you can't move for awhile yet," said the doctor with a joyful chuckle. "I thought you'd never care to move again! But don't fret yourself into a fever over it: we'll have some of those bandages off in a few days, meanwhile patience. And here's Mrs. Rossi waiting to say good morning to her husband; she's worth a regiment of ordinary nurses!"

"IMMANUEL SHOUTED AGAIN AND AGAIN TO THE FIREMEN"

It was Hilda who emerged from behind the screen, a great wave of color flooding her pale cheeks. Her eyes filled as he looked down at him, but behind the tears shone a light he had never seen there before. The spirit-flame burned in the dark no longer; fear and remorse and tears and love had done their work; it was the eternal womanly that shone in the blue eyes, and their light was sweet and satisfying.

A week later, when his growing strength had confirmed the doctor's cheerful prophecy, she told him how the firemen had rescued him from his frightful position in the burning building. Blackened and smothered with smoke, frightfully burned and bruised, he had lain unrecognized in the hospital ward till the man Stark, himself dying not far away, had revealed his identity.

"And you?" he asked. "Were you frightened when I failed to come home?" She dropped her eyes, a deep-shamed crimson stealing over her face and neck. "I did not know it till late the next day," he said in a low voice. "There was a dinner at the Bidwell's that night, then a concert. I slept late, and was awakened by my maid, who told me what had happened. If you had died that night, I would have killed myself." She spoke the words quietly and with conviction.

He laid his hand on hers. "You have been with me night and day," he murmured. "You are pale and worn with watching, dear; I saw you as an angel in my dreams."

She drew away from his touch with a strange look. "Only in dreams could you think of me in that way," she said sadly. "I have ruined your life—No, do not speak till I have told you. I must tell you! I married you because you had the money. I wanted a fine house, jewels, dresses and all that money could buy. I have been—Oh, how can I tell you all—I must tell you. I would have married Jack Snider, but Amelia Hurd brought me a paper. It told all, and I—" "Stop!" he begged. "I know it." "You know it?" she whispered. "How—when?" "She told me—sent me the paper—years ago. I knew you didn't love me. I tried not to force myself upon you. But, Hilda, why have you brought me back from death, if you do not—" His eyes finished the question.

A faint smile played about her lips. "You'll not dare say that to the doctors or the nurses," she said, looking down. "They wouldn't, in justice to themselves, allow me a bit of credit. And, indeed, I don't deserve it. I deserve nothing." Two large tears splashed on her folded hands. Tears were as near the surface as ever, but they were different tears.

"You haven't answered me yet," he urged. "If I should tell you now that the money was lost and that we must go back to the little house to live, what would you say?"

"I am so glad!" she cried, delight beaming from eyes and lips. "I will go with you; I will work for you, oh, so hard! for I love you, my husband!"

"I did not tell you that I had lost the money, sweetheart," he confessed after a while. "I only said, what if I should tell you that the money was gone?"

Her face fell. "I wish we were poor," she said passionately. "I wish—"

She stopped short, her eyes on his. "You wanted me to help you," she murmured humbly, "and I would not. But now—if you can trust me—I am sure that I can be of some use to the poor people."

And he knew that at last he had found his other self, and that from henceforth they two would go forth together to work until the evening.

What are the ten leading American inventions, and why are they so considered?

Answers to Question of the Week

Divine Love, Heaven, Eternity

The infinite love of the Son of God, giving his life freely, to satisfy divine justice, and make it possible to serve the human race; the grandeur of the home in heaven prepared for those who accept him as their Saviour; the duration of eternity. AZILE.

God, the Soul, Love

First: a God, existing by his own will, eternal, all-powerful, just, wise and kind; creating and preserving the heavens, and the wayside flower as well; doing all things by his own power and will. Second: a soul, God-like in origin, almost unlimited powers of development, with freedom to choose "God only," or aught else it wishes—yes, freedom to reject and defraud its Creator. Third: a love so great, that God gave his only Son to redeem those who had refused obedience to him. He "loved us, and gave himself for us that he might redeem" and purify. A. I. McLEAN.

Divine Love, Forgiveness, Atonement

God is love, and the author of all pure, holy love; hence that is one of the greatest thoughts for man to consider. The atonement is the second great thought. The third is, why God in his mercy can take a deep-dyed sinner, and so cleanse his heart and beautify his character as to make him fit to dwell in a pure and holy heaven. MRS. E. KIDSON.

Origin, Life, Destiny

1. My origin. 2. My life. 3. My destiny. Whence came I? "Dust thou art to dust thou art, was not spoken of the soul." "And God said, Let us make man in our own image, and after our likeness. . . . And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of ating the distresses of the world. Charity is that beautiful attitude of the heart towards man that, if universally exercised, would accelerate the spiritual dawn of the world. MARY DREW.

God, the Soul, Providence

First, the contemplation of God's wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth. It is the thought of this perfect, complete character of God that makes us worship and adore him. Second, the Immortality of the soul. Third, God's protecting providence; his care for all the creatures of his hand. This doctrine of God's providence is the Christian's hope and stay.

Behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God, within the shadow,

EMILY H. WATSON.

God, Man's Duty, Immortality

1. First in grandeur is the thought of God; or, to use the name by which he saw fit to reveal himself, Jehovah, the infinite, eternal, self-existent One. Especially great and glorious is the thought of God in Christ, revealing unfathomable depths of tenderness and love. 2. Next, we place the thought of our own responsibility to God. This, indeed, Daniel charm in its grand, far-reaching possibilities of attainment, for who can estimate the power of an endless life. Death is a cessation of the vital forces. To the unbeliever, death comes as the king of terrors; but to a true believer, a welcome guest. He who meditates upon death occasionally cannot but live well. The judgment. The marshaling of the great hosts of earth before the throne, to receive the rewards for the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or bad. The joys and reunion of earth's dearest ties, or the separation and the despair of the lost. The grand oratorios, the shouts of the redeemed, the crowning of the heroes who have fought the fierce battles of earth and have overcome the great adversary of souls. F. M. B.

God, Eternity, Space

God, eternity and space. These three things are infinite in themselves, and therefore can be comprehended entirely only by an infinite Mind; but we can comprehend them in part. JOSEPH HAMILTON.

God, the World, our Mission

1. God. 2. The world. 3. Your mission in life. First God, because he has been the supreme thought in the minds of the deepest thinkers in all ages. The world. Its origin has always been a source of much controversy; but all consistent, thinking men, while they may differ in their opinion as to the nature of God, ascribe the existence of the world to God. The greatness of the world is one of the greatest thoughts of which the mind is capable. The mission a man chooses as his life-work decides how much glory his life shall give to God. This is a burning question. These three thoughts have their source in God, as all great thoughts have. SAM. C. MEADE.

DIVINE SERVICE AT THE NAVAL TRAINING STATION, NEWPORT, R. I.; CHAPLAIN JONES ADDRESSING THE NAVAL APPRENTICES

The Naval Training Station at Newport is on Coasters Harbor Island, a beautiful spot, but where very severe weather is experienced in winter. Sundays, at 9.30 A.M., the training boys are mustered, in their best blue uniforms, and present a striking appearance as the inspecting officer makes his tour between their ranks. At 10.30 mess-call is sounded. After answering their muster, they are marched into the large drill hall, where the chaplain is already at his desk. They reverently take seats. The band strikes up the opening hymn, and the boys join in with great enthusiasm. Many of the summer guests at Newport attend the services on the Island. The photograph on this page shows the first service Chaplain Jones conducted. Congress has appropriated for a church building, which is to be erected on the Island soon. There are eleven hundred apprentices on the Island, and the Chaplain has a wonderful opportunity for work in this particular instance.

life, and man became a living soul." My life. What is it? If made in the image and after the likeness of God, should not my life purpose be the perpetuation of that image, and a fixed determination never to efface or deface that likeness? "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." My destiny. Where shall I reap it? "I go to prepare a place for you, . . . that where I am, there ye may be also." If agnosticism knows nothing positive about immortality, far better to follow one who does know. "Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing." G. C. MAHON.

Philanthropy, Benevolence, Charity

Philanthropy, benevolence and charity. These three are comprehended under one head—altruism. The three qualities when blended in the human mind are prolific of the greatest good to mankind. Philanthropy in action upon acquiring or receiving a benefit is immediately seized with a wholesome desire to transmit itself to others. Benevolence is charity in action. It goes about with winged feet on errands of mercy, uplifting the fallen, strengthening the weak, and generally allevi-

Webster declared to be the greatest thought that had ever filled his mind. 3. Then comes the thought of immortality; of millions upon millions of unending æons, spent either with the Lord or apart from him. These are the thoughts that differentiate us from the lower animals, and link us to the angelic, the divine. AMELIA HOYT.

God, Satan, Self

God, Satan, and Self. The thought of God includes that of eternal existence, omnipresence, and infinity of "wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." The personal devil is the centre of an awful cluster of mystery, of woe, and of hate. The concept of self, Ego, branches out into the problems of creation; reproduction; unity in the trinity of body, mind, and soul; the freedom of the human will, in harmony with the foreordination of the Supreme Ruler; man's influence upon his fellow-men; and the present life as the seed of destiny. A. W. LEWIS.

Life, Death, Judgment

Life, death and the judgment. Life is a sacred thing, because it is one of the first and grandest thoughts that come to the human mind, and notwithstanding its overwhelming sorrows, its staggering failures, blasted hopes and bitter disappointments, life has a peculiar

Miscellaneous Questions

E. H. P. Montesano, Wash. In the death of a dear friend, should we look upon it as "a dispensation of Providence," or a violation of the laws of nature, for which man is responsible?

Death is certain to all, though the manner and time may vary, owing to many causes. When a dear one departs, therefore, it is only in obedience to the general law governing our mentality—a dispensation of Providence, which comes to all. One would not, however, term a fever, or an accident, or any such occurrence a "dispensation." Usually, the term has no more meaning, than that indicated above.

S. W. McC., Fullerton, Calif. A man ought to be able to live off his business without devoting Sunday to it. When his conscience pricks him, it is time to change his business.

C. J., California. The statement that President McKinley died from any other cause than the bullet wound is without foundation. All the physicians were agreed as to the cause of death.

Subscriber, Estherville, Ia. We believe it is customary, but the bank will advise you correctly.

A. E. B., Ottawa, Can. You would be received in most churches on confession of faith. Better consult your pastor, or the minister of the church you desire to join, and he will advise you properly.

THE GREAT MOHAMMEDAN FESTIVAL IN THE MARKET-PLACE OF TANGIER

Photographed specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Fanatical Dances and Self-Mutilation

* A Wild Festival Among the Moors *

Barbarian Scenes on a Mohammedan
Gala Day

WE have lately seen some strange doings here in Tangier. A certain sect of Moorish Mohammedans have recently observed several feast days, in honor of the patron saints of Morocco. About 10,000 people gathered in the market-place in Tangier. Many of the mountain tribes were represented, each man and boy carrying a gun and a large knife. In the morning, at a given signal, men with drums and bugles marched into the spacious market-place, followed by a warm of men carrying banners of many colors.

Suddenly hundreds of people began dancing, jumping up and down, trying to keep step to the music of the drums and bugles, which were now playing very fast. Then a man, with an armful of hatchets, rushed in among the dancers. He looked wildly excited and called to his followers to come and get the hatchets—which order they quickly obeyed.

Pandemonium now set in. Every man and boy took a hatchet, and danced until he worked himself up into a frenzy. Then, holding the hatchet in both hands, he would bring it down on his clean-shaven head with stunning force.

We stood close by, and held our breath at this strange spectacle. On they went, one after the other, cutting until the blood flowed freely down their faces and over their bodies, saturating what few garments they wore. While this savage rite was proceeding, others brought into the ring loaves of bread, which were used to soak up the blood. This bread was then passed around, and eaten voraciously by these religious fanatics. We gazed until we grew sick of this horrible scene. Our hearts were pierced through, and we yearned for this barbarian people, that they might know Christ and believe in him.

That evening, in our Christian Mission home, we could not help but weep for the poor, deluded, ignorant heathen, whom we had seen that day cutting and lacerating themselves. How thankful should they be who have the true light of Christ's teaching!

A few days after this feast, the people met again at Tangier, in still larger numbers. As early as eight o'clock in the morning, the bugles and drums sounded, and the people began dancing and leaping up and down, yelling at the top of their voices, until they were worked into a frenzy. As we sat on our horses, we could see a man come rushing along, with a live sheep under his arms. This was brought into the ring. As soon as the dancers caught sight of the sheep their eyes flashed, and seizing the poor quivering animal they began to tear it to pieces with their hands! They devoured the raw meat, a sight we could hardly believe, although seeing it with our own eyes.

They were more like beasts than human beings. One man with the sheep's heart in his hand, looked at it as he held it up, then bit into it fiercely. So many people clamored for a piece of the quivering flesh that they scrambled and fell over each other. Thousands witnessed these scenes from the surrounding house-tops. The soldiers in Tangier stood on guard all that day. It would require very little provocation for these people to exterminate the Christian missionaries on short notice, while in their fanatical frenzy.

One of the photographs I send you was taken on the day of the feast, and just as they had finished eating the sheep. The Sultan's soldiers are standing guard, and down toward the left are those who carry the banners, while right in front of the banner-bearers and in the circle, are the sheep-eaters. One woman, with hair hanging down over her shoulders held the sheep-skin after all had eaten. They tried to take it from her, but she would throw herself on the ground, prostrating her body over the sheep-skin. She was the only woman whom we observed joining in the actual feast in the inner circle. Another photograph shows a number of the dancing sect, who use the hatchet for self-mutilation. They think that by doing so they are pleasing God and their patron saints. The third photograph is that of El Hassan, our native Christian teacher, whom we greatly like. He has been baptized, has traveled and is fairly educated. We hope that some generous American friend of our work here may find it in his or her heart to undertake the support of this native Christian among his benighted brethren in Morocco.

We trust we may have your continued prayers, and also the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We believe our Mission Home is a lighthouse in this dark land of Morocco, and we pray and trust that many shall there find Christ as their Saviour. Our work is independent, and we are supported entirely by the free-will offerings of Christians interested in missions among the heathen.

A MOMENTOUS QUESTION

TEXT, 1. Cor. 11: 22 { "DESPISE YE THE CHURCH OF GOD?"

WHILE rummaging through a bookstore the other day, I purchased a volume with this suggestive title: "Why Men do Not Go to Church." In it the author gives many blunt statements. He asserts that, in New York City alone, not more than three per cent. of all the male population are members of the Protestant churches. He makes this charge against New York City, with its millions upon millions of dollars invested in church architecture, with its millions of dollars every year lavishly expended for evangelistic work. He makes this charge against New York City, which is not a heathen town, but which claims to be not only the wealthiest but the most enlightened city in our Christian land. The author of that book further declared that not more than one-half of all the inhabitants of this country ever attend church. By that the author means the vast majority of Americans seldom set foot in any church building, because the most of the half who do attend church do so occasionally only.

With the startling statements of that book still fresh in my mind, I would like to ask you the question which Paul asked the non-church-goers of Corinth. The world needs precisely the things that the church was organized to supply. It needs strength to resist temptation; it needs rules for the guidance of life; it needs support under affliction; solace in bereavement, and a hope of heaven after death. All these blessings come by Christianity. It is therefore worth while inquiring what are the obstacles that keep men from coming into the church and obtaining them. So I not only want to find out why the vast majority of people do not join or regularly attend church, but I also want to try to remove those difficulties so that you, one and all will come into the fellowship of the divine institution in which are numbered the great hosts of the followers of the Lord Jesus.

Unsolved Mysteries

"Well," says some one in answer to the words of my text, "the reason I despise the Church of God is because there are certain parts of the Bible I do not understand. Therefore I will not profess to believe what I cannot comprehend." Now, my friend, such a statement is simply absurd. From such talk, one might suppose that the only inexplicable things in the whole universe are those recorded between the lids of Holy Writ. Why, there are whole realms and cycles and universes of facts, in every direction, yet untraversed and unexplained. You cannot focus the whole heavens with one telescope, nor span infinity with the finite. You might as well try to build a range of mountains from Long Island to England, by pitching pebbles into the Atlantic Ocean, or try to empty the Pacific by dipping up the waters with a sewing girl's thimble, as to attempt to build up a system of science, or to develop a belief in the Bible, unless you are willing to accept some things which you cannot explain.

"My young friend," said an elderly Christian gentleman to a young college student, whom he met in the train, and whom he had overheard making some such remark as yours, "My young friend, I thought I heard you say, in reference to the Bible, that you would not believe anything you could not explain. Now, in yonder fields are some pigs, sheep, horses, and geese, all eating grass. Can you tell me why the same grass makes bristles for the pigs, wool for the sheep, hair for the horses, and feathers for the geese?" I would ask you the same question that Peter Cartwright, the itinerant preacher, asked a blatant agnostic who made boast of his unbelief. "My friend," said he, "you say you will not believe anything you cannot explain. Can you tell me why some cows have horns, and other cows have no horns?" There are things innumerable in nature, and all around us, which we fail to understand; yet we accept them without question. The mysteries of the natural sciences piled up about us, are quite as inexplicable as the great mystery of godliness.

But though statements may be made in the Bible which you and I cannot understand, the salient truths, the Calvary truths, the converting truths, are all simply told truths. I defy any unbiased man to read the simple words of the four Gospels, and remain blind to their meaning. No man can read the story of the Prodigal Son, and fail to realize that God is represented by the aged father, that his own sinful life is represented by the sins of the younger son, that repentance and peace are represented by the return home, and the Divine love and forgiveness by the ring and the fatted calf, and the father's kiss. Spiritual light and deeper faith will come later. So, my brother, as you believe in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost; as you believe that Jesus suffered and died upon the Cross for our sins; as you believe that Christ has gone to heaven to prepare a dwelling-place for those who are cleansed by his blood, you believe all that is needed to qualify you to come into the church he established on earth. This was the saving belief of the Philippian jailer, to whom Paul said, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." A man is not necessarily barred from the Church of Jesus Christ because he does not fully understand all the Bible. He is received and welcomed because he believes that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

The Essentials of Faith

One day, a woman came to the most noted minister of the South, the Rev. B. M. Palmer, of New Orleans. She said: "Pastor, I cannot accept and believe the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church; therefore, I am afraid I must have my name dropped from the church roll." "What do you not believe?" asked Doctor Palmer. "Well, there is the Presbyterian doctrine of foreordination; I cannot believe that God knows the end from the beginning. I cannot understand how he can foresee everything, and yet I be a free agent." "I never asked you to believe the doctrine of foreordination," said Dr. Palmer. "Well," said the woman, "I cannot believe the doctrine of election." "I never asked you to believe the doctrine of election," again said Dr. Palmer. "What then do you want me to believe?" "As a minister of the Presbyterian Church," Dr. Palmer replied, "I have to accept the Confession of Faith. But you, as a lay member, only have to believe two great doctrines. The first is, that man is a sinner. You believe that? The second is, that Jesus is a Saviour, and died for your sins. You believe that? As a believer in those two great doctrines, I want you to throw yourself upon the mercy of Christ, and you can be saved. This is all the Presbyterian Church, or any other Protestant Church, demands of you for membership." Doctor Palmer was right. You may not understand all of the Bible; but you do understand and believe enough to make you acceptable for membership in Christ's Church. You do believe in the Atonement. You do believe that Jesus died to save you. Throw away your doubts! Hold to your beliefs! The Gospel Church lifeboat is too fine a craft to be scuttled, merely because we know not all the planks out of which its hull was built. Come into the church lifeboat to-day, on the simple faith that its keel was made from the straight beam of the Calvary Cross.

Inconsistent Christians

"Well," remarks another man, "I do not join the church because of the inconsistencies of its members. Some profess one thing, and practice another. They say Christians ought to be kind, and loving, and gentle, and helpful, to their fellow church members. Then they demonstrate that some of the worse fights on earth are church fights. The elder, who prays the loudest in prayer-meeting, may be the farmer who never comes out second best in a horse trade. And the gossip of the Sewing Society is just as merciless as the gossip at the club, or in a ball-room. As long as the church is filled with hypocrites, I do not want to join it."

Stop, my brother! You know that some of the very best men in every community are members of the different Christian Churches. You know, as well as I know, that though some of the church members may be hypocrites, the vast majority are men and women who have banded themselves together for the purpose of prayer and communion with God, and of trying to make their fellowship better, and purer, and truer, and more Christlike. There are thousands and tens of thousands of church members who are no more hypocrites than your Christian father and mother, who were also members of a Christian Church, were hypocrites. To demonstrate how much you really respect the Christian Church—though you may not know it—I would like to ask you a question. If you were stranded, as a young woman, in a distant city, without money or friends, to whom would you go for help? To the saloon-keeper? To the rich brewer? No, no! Without doubt, you would go straight to some Christian minister's home. You would go to him; just as many young men and women have come to me, and you would say: "My father and mother are members of Dr. So and So's Church, in such and such a town. I have no money, I want to get home. Will you help me?" To have you realize how much you respect the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ, I would picture you stranded, as a shipwrecked sailor, upon a strange coast. What would you most prefer to see? A fortress, a king's palace, an army encampment, or the steeple of a Christian Church? You know, as well as every intelligent man or woman knows, that the community which lives under the shadow of the church spire is a God-fearing community. The community which does not protect the Christian Church is an unsafe community in which to dwell, and there is no exception to the rule.

Solace in Religion

What did you do when your little flaxen-haired child died? Did you take the small, white casket into a ball-room? Did you have her dancing-master pronounce the eulogy over her dead body? Did you have her music-teacher sing a song. No; you took her to the church. You took her into the church where many prayers had been offered. You did not have a dancing-master pronounce a eulogy over her white still form. You called in the Christian minister for the last reverent offices for your beloved dead.

Now, as you respect the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ, and as you would not live in any community where that church is not honored, why should you despise the church because some men and women in it are not all that they profess to be? Because, here and there, at the Communion Table is seated a sinner, whose heart may be as dead to God as were the corpses which the Egyptians used to place at their festal banquets to teach the lessons of mortality, is that any reason why you should despise the church, and neglect to perform your own duty toward it? Because Benedict Arnold was a traitor, would you therefore pronounce George Washington and all the soldiers of the Revolutionary armies to be traitors? Because last week a criminal forged a check upon a national bank of New York City, does that prove that all the checks presented this week at the different national banks are worthless?

When you criticize the sincerity of certain church members, you should not forget that the Church of Christ was instituted for the imperfect as well as the perfect, for the moral cripples as well as for those who are spiritually whole. In the church there are to be found members like a man whom a friend of mine was one day defending. Howard Crosby came to this gentleman and said: "Doctor, how can you like such a man? You know he is not what he ought to be." My friend turned and said, "Doctor Crosby, if you had a little child who had lost an eye, or was deaf, or who was born lame, would you despise him on account of his infirmity? Well, my friend is a moral cripple. I do not like him because he has lost one eye and one leg and one arm; but I do love him because, by the grace of God, he is trying to struggle against his daily temptations, and his spiritual deformities." So you will find in the Church of God to-day moral cripples. They are struggling every day of their lives against sinful temptations; they keep on struggling; keep on praying; keep on reaching up to God; keep on staying in the church, because they know that Christ did not come to institute a church for perfect men. He came to heal the sick, and not the well. The Church of God is the great earthly spiritual hospital, where Christ, as the surgeon, loves to set the crooked limbs; where Christ, as the spiritual ophthalmologist, loves to open the eyes that are blinded of sin.

Christians Outside the Church

"Well," observes another hearer, "the reason I do not join the church, is because I believe a man can be just as good a Christian outside the church as inside." Now, I would not assert that all men who are non-church-goers are unchristian men. John Newton used to say, "When I get to heaven, I shall have three great surprises. One great surprise will be to find so many people there I did not expect to see. The next surprise will be to find so many people absent whom I expected to see. And the third great surprise will be to find that I got to heaven myself." Like John Newton, when most of us reach heaven—I pray we may all be there!—I believe we shall be very much surprised to find there some people who never entered the church door, and never publicly professed their faith at the church altar. Mr. Beecher once beautifully and poetically said, "I am glad that some Gospel seeds have been blown over the church wall, and that fruit trees and flowers most pleasant to the eye are springing up outside the church garden, as well as inside. And though I wish they were within the enclosure, where the boards out of the woods could not waste them, and the wild beasts of the field devour them, yet I love them and am glad to see them growing there."

But though there may be Christian men and women living outside of the church fellowship, I for one do not believe I could be a Christian and not be a professing member of the Church of Christ. I do not believe that I could turn my back upon my church and still love my Christ as I love him to-day. And, my brother and sister, neither do I believe you can turn your back upon the Church of God, and yet give to Christ your true and fervent love; because I believe that, as Christians, we should look upon the church as a collection of God's children. Therefore we should accept and love its members as our spiritual brothers and sisters—children of God—and we ourselves should long to be of the spiritual household.

The Garden of Christ

Mark you well my statement. I did not affirm that there were no Christian men outside of the Church of Jesus Christ; but I did affirm that a man cannot be as good a Christian outside of the Christian Church as inside. There may be good Christians found outside of the church. There may be good Christians who prefer the society of Sabbath desecraters and worldly pleasure-seekers, instead of the society of God's children, who love to gather in the House of Praise. But I frankly confess I have never found good Christians who prefer to seek the society of worldly pleasure-seekers, to the society of those who delight in God's house. Jack roses may grow in cesspools, but as a rule the most beautiful roses swing a sweeter incense in a flower-garden than among the thorns of a wild hedge.

"Well," answers another man, "I will tell you frankly why I despise the Church of God. The reason I do not join the church is because it is too strait-laced for me and I am not willing to give up my own way of living." My brother, I believe you have told me the exact truth. I believe ninety-nine hundredths of those who scoff at the church scoff principally because they are not ready to surrender some secret sin. But as you have given me one honest answer, I want you to give me another to a question just as important. If you are not ready to surrender your secret sin and join the church, where is that sin going to send you? Some time ago I stood in the depot of our national capital, watching a little colored boy, about five years old, asleep upon one of the benches. This little baby had a card pinned to his coat which read like this, "Conductor, will you please see that this little boy is put in the right train, and sent to Augusta, Ga., where friends will meet him." As I stood there watching that little child, I said to myself, "Some people seem to be sleeping in the great depot of sin, as unconscious of their surroundings as that colored baby. They care not what is going to happen to them. And Satan has pinned a tag upon them to send them through, like baggage, to the great city of eternal despair. My unrepentant brother, as you are unwilling to join the church because you are reluctant to give up your secret sin, I ask you where will that secret sin ultimately send you? You need to be aroused from your spiritual lethargy and to realize your awful danger. I would especially plead with you to surrender your sins and dedicate your life to Jesus Christ by joining the church because, in your heart, you know well what you ought to do. It has always been a question in my mind whether some of those poor, loathsome creatures who were reared in the slums of a great city, and who never heard the name of Jesus except in blasphemy, might not in God's mercy be made as fit for the Celestial City as some who, having been born in Christian homes, have led a very indifferent Christian life. But, my brother, though there may be some excuse for those born in the sinful slums of a great city for not renouncing their sins and joining the church, there is no excuse for you. You were born in a Christian home. You were reared amid Christian surroundings. You were started out with Christian prayers. And the mere fact that you made such an excuse as you have, proves that the Holy Spirit is mightily striving with you to-day to confess Christ and join the church the Saviour founded on earth.

Hereditary Responsibility

You are in exactly the same position as was Doctor Parley, when he was a dissipated college student. One morning, when he was trying to sleep off the debauch of the previous night, a classmate came into his room, and, sitting upon the bed by his side, said, "Parley, I have been thinking of what you are doing. You are wasting your life for time and eternity. Now, Parley, it does not matter much what happens to me. I am a nobody; but you have the best brain in college. Besides that, you were born of good blood. Unless you stop your sins, I shall cut your acquaintance." So, to-day, all the Christian influences which surround your past life, all the Christian influences which surround your present life, all your hopes for eternity, are pleading and begging you, in Christ's name, to turn from your sins. They are pleading with you to come into the Church of Jesus as a repentant sinner, because you know and feel—you intensely feel to-day—that you ought to come. Are you man enough, in Christ's name, to come to his altar now?

But there is one answer yet to the question of my text. This answer comes from many a troubled heart. You say to me, "Mr. Talmage, I do not despise the church, except by my actions in a public way. The reason I do not join the church is because I have so many home duties that I cannot do my share in church work, if I should join. In a few years I expect to take my place as a member at the church altar." Now, my friend, I want you to realize this great truth: God never ordained that one duty should conflict with other duties. He never wants a mother to leave the bedside of her sick child in order to attend a missionary meeting. He never compels a man to do for the church more than he can conscientiously do. But Christ does demand this: He does demand that you profess and confess his love before men. And you cannot do that in a better way than at the church altar. Then, let the most imminent Christian duty decide what you ought to do thereafter.

The Power of Example

And I would especially plead with you to confess Christ in the church before men; because, as you have others depending upon you, your present actions will probably decide how your loved ones will act and feel towards the church of Christ's establishment. This fact was demonstrated some years ago in Smyrna. Two sailors, for some weeks, had been attending the Mission services. One night, in answer to the invitation to come forward and confess Christ and join the church, one of the sailors turned and said, "Well, I will come, if Bill will!" But "Bill" would not come. But the night before the ship was to sail, the two sailors came forward and gave their hearts to Christ and joined the church. Then the Christian workers in Smyrna asked "Bill" how it was that he came to join the church. In rough sailor fashion, he said: "Well, I liked to attend your meetings, because they made me feel good. I used to think of the old times when, on Sunday afternoons in the old home at New Bedford, we used to sing the same songs. Mother was there, and my sisters and brothers and father were all there. And I really wanted to join your church. But when Tom said he would come if I did, it made me mad. What had I to do with Tom's actions? But a couple of nights ago, Tom was sick. I sat up with him, and as he was tossing around in his bunk, I heard him muttering something, and as I put my ear down to his mouth, I heard him say, 'Oh Bill, won't you come, Bill?' It's my last chance for heaven, Bill. Oh Bill, won't you come? Won't you come?" And then and there I said to myself: 'If my actions are going to keep Tom out of heaven, why, I'll come,' and here we are, sir, Tom and Bill!" So to-day, the loved ones in your home and in the store, and those who are dependent upon you, are pleading with you to come into the church for their sakes, as well as for your own sake and for Christ's. "Despise ye the church?" Nay, nay! In your heart, you feel that it is in the church you ought to confess Christ. You know it is into the church you will want to be carried when you are dead. And it is from its hallowed precincts you will want to go forth to meet Him when you shall dwell with Him in heaven forever and ever, and ever.

"Kurn Hattin," America's Mount of Beatitudes

AMERICA'S "Kurn Hattin" is the centre of a rare New England landscape, in which the Connecticut River and the old New Hampshire hills play picturesque part. "Kurn Hattin," as Bible students know, is the Hebrew name for the Mount of Beatitudes, in Palestine; and the beautiful title was given to the institution of which this story tells, because of the resemblance of the hill on which it stands to the sacred mount.

The New England Kurn Hattin Homes Association, for Homeless and Neglected Boys and Girls, operates now three homes in Westminster, Vt. The administration building on the hill, which gives name to all, accommodating thirty-five boys, and the "Harriet Goodridge" Home for Girls, accommodating eighteen, are nearly a mile apart. The "Warner Memorial," housing eighteen lads, is at Saxton's River, seven miles away. A large farm is connected with each building, the total acreage being three hundred. The Administration building is large and very attractive, with a wide piazza running its whole length. Through the generosity of a noble friend of the work, it has been deeded to the Association, to be perpetually used as a home for destitute and orphan children.

The aim of Kurn Hattin is to provide a Christian home for promising and healthy children who are orphaned, friendless or destitute, and who might otherwise become a menace to our civilization. Of the sixty-two children who are now in the homes, six have lost both parents, seventeen their father, and twelve their mother. The children are fitted for life by receiving a common school education, and an industrial training as far as our means will allow. They are taught to do all kinds of work, both in the house and on the farm. The Association does not ask for the entire surrender of the child, but receives him with the hope that he remain until sixteen years of age. This is a distinctive feature of "Kurn Hattin," as it is more economical and certainly more humane, to prepare a boy to go back to his mother, and help support her in her old age, than to rear him from her and put him in a private family, to care for his adopted parents in his maturity, while the mother who bore him goes to the poorhouse. "The home is the bulwark of the nation," Jacob A. Riis, the noted reformer, in a recent conversation with the superintendent, said that the preservation of the home is the "bed-rock principle" upon which to build.

The management is constantly receiving applications to admit children under seven years of age, for which they have at present no provision. The Christian Endeavorers of Vermont have been asked to help furnish and make ready two vacant houses belonging to the Association, to accommodate these, and they are responding well.

We hope to have a Home ready for the little ones before the summer of 1902 is passed. There is room enough on the land held by the Association for cottages to house a thousand children. The "Warner Memorial" Home at Saxton's River, with its farm of one hundred and fifty acres, and the Administration building at Westminster, are free from encumbrance, but there is a debt of $5,200 (five thousand two hundred dollars) on the farm and buildings which are now used in connection with the latter.

The Homes were incorporated under the laws of Vermont, in 1894. The President is the Hon. W. J. Van Patten of Burlington, Vt., a man of many good deeds, and the following gentlemen comprise the board of trustees: Mr. N. G. Williams, manager of the Vermont

Farm Machine Co., Bellows Falls, Vt.; Pres. W. J. Tucker of Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H.; Rev. C. A. Dickinson, Mr. Edward Miles Abbott, Mr. Morris A. Hall, and Mr. Geo. B. Graff (publisher's agent of the Christian Endeavor World), of Boston, Mass.; Rev. George F. Chapin, Saxton's River, Vt., and Mr. Chas. H. Thompson, Brattleboro, Vt. Charles E. Bishop, the superintendent, was born in Plymouth, England, and came to this country when twenty-three years of age. With the exception of six months spent on a farm in Missouri, he resided in Lynn, and for eight years previous to filling his present position, was in business for himself. Much of his spare time was spent in Christian Endeavor and Sunday School work, and when the offer was made him, one year ago, to take charge of the "Kurn Hattin Homes," he felt it to be a call he could not refuse. He is ably seconded by his wife, Mrs. Bishop, a graduate of Friends' School, Providence, R. I., and for some years previous to her marriage was a public school teacher. Both husband and wife are members of the Society of Friends, in which church they have labored together for many years.

The late D. L. Moody said, "I heartily sympathize with the effort that my friends are making for the neglected children in our cities."

The most profitable work, from every standpoint, is with and for children. "Prevention is better than cure." Sure prevention is better than a possible cure. Experience proves that not more than one per cent. of the waifs and strays that have been reclaimed from the lowest dregs of society have proven failures. It is better to place children in a home now, than a reformatory later. Kurn Hattin is in no sense a reformatory; and incorrigible children are not received.

The "Homes" are unsectarian, but thoroughly Christian. Any inquiries addressed to Superintendent Bishop will receive prompt attention.

Death by a Word and Life for a Look

The Brazen Serpent

NUMBERS 21: 1-9

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"AS MOSES LIFTED UP THE SERPENT IN THE WILDERNESS, EVEN SO MUST THE SON OF MAN BE LIFTED UP. JOHN 3: 14, 15

WHEN even one person in a neighborhood has been bitten by a poisonous snake, how great is the alarm! The physician is called in, and his skill is tested to the utmost. If one snake bite can cause such consternation, what must have been the state of mind in Israel when thousands of persons were bitten in one day, long ago in the valley of Arabah, remote from skilful physicians! Can we imagine the suffering, the anxiety, the dying groans? We see among this people only three who are aged. No others are beyond fifty years of age. We note that the three aged persons have not been bitten, neither are there any children who are suffering, and very few young persons—only those in middle life. While we stand and look with curious interest, we see a donkey approaching, urged forward by two stalwart young men, while another keeps close watch upon a person who is lying helpless, rolled up as a burden on the back of the donkey. The three young men are evidently brothers, and it is their mother they are carrying forward. She has been bitten by serpents; her limbs are terribly swollen, for the thread-like serpents have entered her body by way of her feet. The father is waiting at home, lest his slow steps should lessen the speed. The sons have heard of a remedy for their mother, and they are hurrying her to the place where she can receive it. Restoratives are administered by the way, without stopping, in order to keep up her strength, but their great fear is that she will die on the way to the promised cure. They speak cheering words, which have even better effect than the drugs; but she is groaning, and says, "It is of no use."

The woman has been accustomed to look on the dark side. She was a child twelve years old, when her people received the terrible sentence from God, that they should not enter the Promised Land for forty years, as a punishment for their lack of faith in him, and for their wicked fear of the giants. She has heard her parents many times talk about that sad and awful disappointment, and she has heard them murmur on that account against God. Indeed their murmurings have only been stopped by death. She has herself become a murmurer. Nothing ever goes right with her. Her fears have been aroused anew now that the Israelites are again at the gate of the Promised Land. Her sons do not show her fears. They are young, and full of faith and hope. The only anxiety of the father at home is that his dear wife, so lovely in her character aside from despondency, may reach the spot where she can be healed. The sons have now brought her very near the place of safety. They redouble their energies. And this they need to do, not only because of their mother's failing strength, but because they find themselves in a throng of persons bent on a similar errand, bearing their loved and stricken ones where relief may be found. Some are bearing fathers and mothers; others sisters and brothers and friends.

Does it seem strange that no child is afflicted? It will not, when we know the cause of the suffering. Children are not given to murmuring against God. All of those who are suffering have murmured against him, and they have been bitten by the snakes as God's punishment. But there is mercy with God's severity. He has provided a way for them to be healed. They must get in sight of a serpent of brass that Moses has raised aloft at God's command. Can the murmurers bring themselves to trust God and obey the command, "Look and live?" Some of them, many of them, are doing so, and they are recovering. But the three young men with their mother have come so near to the brazen serpent that they halt. The mother's eyes seem to be closed in death. They place her in an upright position. They beseech her, for love of them, to look. She does look, looks as earnestly as her feeble strength will permit. She feels a thrill of health. Presently she is able to get down from the donkey and stand upon the ground. She praises God, and promises never to murmur again. Then she thinks of her dear husband at home. She is able to walk, but consents to ride, that she may get on faster, until they come in sight of home. Then she insists on getting down and walking, that she may show her husband that her cure has been accomplished. Yes, she is cured of the snake bites, but better than all, she is cured of murmuring. She will never again be heard to say, "Everything always goes wrong."

What wonder that serpent of brass was preserved in memory of what had been done through it! No doubt that mother and her sons often had a grateful look at it! Let us hope they did not forget to recognize God in it. Many did forget, and even came to worship that brazen serpent by offering incense to it, until, after seven hundred years, good King Hezekiah had it destroyed, because the people were making an idol out of it. "It is only Nehustan," he said, "a piece of brass. It is God who saved our fathers through it, and God only—no symbols—should be worshipped."

Illustration and Application

It was the people's tongues that got them into their great trouble with the serpents, and no member of our sinful bodies gets us into more trouble to-day than that same "unruly member." The Israelites murmured because God cut off the water he had miraculously caused to flow from the smitten rock—a symbol of the Holy Spirit that was to be poured out through the smitten, crucified One. Perhaps, he cut it off to test them whether they would trust him. Murmuring about God's providential dispensations with water! It would go hard with even God's own people in our land, if in this summer of unusual floods in cities and cornfields, each murmurer should have to reckon with a rattler. Let us put a watch on our lips to guard not only against those foulest sins of speech, profanity, obscenity and lying; but also the more respectable sins of exaggeration, gossip and murmuring. Let us exalt our tongues by considering how wonderful is the gift of intelligent speech that separates from all animals. Surely so great a gift should be consecrated to God to praise him—not used to blame him, much less to curse him! Let us not count murmuring, and the despondency which is its root, as little sins. All through the Bible (as one can see by looking up the word "murmur" in concordance), God treats murmuring as kindred to profanity. For a Christian to blame God, is as bad as for an untrained sinner to curse him. Let us, for one thing, quit our criticism of the weather. "Hush! He did it"—a child's rebuke—we often need. When God gives water, let us thank him; when he cuts it off, let us trust him. When the rain thwarts our plans, let us say cheerfully: "The Lord rains and reigns!" Let us recall not only all the bad things that may be done with speech, that we may avoid them; but also all the blessings that the human voice can bestow—in song, in sympathy, in prayer—that we may hasten to make our voices into benedictions.

All through the Bible the serpent is the picture of sin. It is like sin, in its stealthy approach, and in the way in which its poison steals through the whole system, bringing death at last. The serpent is like sin also, in its charm and deadly fascination. Whether rattlers can charm human beings or not, they certainly can charm birds. Those who have lived where rattlers abound, tell us they have often seen some bird circling round and round with a pitiful cry, drawing nearer and nearer to some rattlesnake, who was attracting them by his charmed gaze to certain death. In such cases, the birds are sometimes saved by the man who discovers their peril knocking the rattler "out of coil," and so breaking both his charm and his power to spring. It is the cross by which we break the charm and power of sin, destroying it, when we would otherwise have been destroyed by it.

This brings us to the cross as typified in the uplifted serpent and the cry, "There is life for a look." Before we speak of that, we are tempted to tarry on the opposite fact, that there is often death in a look. Not alone on the lips, but on the eyes also, we need to "set a watch." The Bible warns us against "the lust of the eyes," and cries, "Look not thou upon the wine." We need conventions of parents to consider how to secure moral street cleaning—that is, how to protect the eyes of children from what is worse than mud, because it soils the soul's "chambers of imagery." We need over and over again to recall the profound warning of some unknown Japanese sage, of long ago, who put up in a public place, as we have told before, three images of monkeys. The first had one hand over each ear, meaning, "Be careful what you hear." The second had one hand over each eye, meaning, "Be careful what you see." The third had both hands over his mouth, meaning, "Be doubly careful what you say." Many a man could tell how one lingering, sinful look has poisoned his life. Many a one could tell how once listening to what he should bravely have refused to hear, has put a stain on the walls of memory that he has never been able to remove. And in Israel's story, we have but one of many cases where spoken words of doubt and murmuring have proved to be the poison of asps. God had Israel at school as a model class in a Normal, and by them was teaching the world. All who had made serpents of their tongues, were bitten of serpents, to picture the nature and seriousness of their sin. Those newly emancipated slaves were not enough developed to feel the restraint of "judgment to come" in a future world, nor was knowledge enough developed for them to understand what we know of the present retributions of sin that science reveals. And so God "paid them by the day," as it were, in the matter of punishment. God is certainly no less angry with sin, no less sure to punish it to-day. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." He who sows sins, shall here and hereafter reap sorrow. We are assured that serpents infest the path the Israelites followed, both the deadly cobra, and a thread-like snake that enters the foot, carrying "fiery" pain and poison through the system. This last is the one that God used to punish Israel. God had kept back the serpents before. Now he relaxed his restraining hand in the case of those who had sinned by murmuring.

Death for a Look

The same steps they took, are ours to-day: first, the sin; second, the painful consequences; third, repentance; fourth, salvation.

When punishment has wrought penitence God hastens to forgive. As a look may kill, a look may save. Strange that people are so sceptical about "life for a look," because the effect seems too great for the cause, when we all know of cases where it has been death for a look. Destiny often turns on the pivot of a moment. Let us keep ever in mind that the wilderness was God's kindergarten, and that by symbols and acted parables he was teaching this child nation the great truths they could not otherwise receive. What faith is in the abstract he would have found it hard to tell them. They were learning to use their minds by using their senses. And so God bade Moses raise a brazen serpent, that should look like the glittering thing that had bitten them, which was "fiery" in appearance and in its poison pain, and then to tell the people that every one who should look should live. To look was to obey and to pray and to believe, and to those who do these three things God gives pardon and healing.

A Jew who had heard the story of the Cross, but would not accept the Saviour, heard the preacher in continuing his sermon, read the words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whoever believeth in Him may not perish, but have everlasting life." As he listened he recalled the scene in the wilderness, a picture on which he had often dwelt; but as he gazed on it the serpent seemed to fade from view, and Christ upon the cross took its place, with the uplifted eyes of a sin-stricken world turning to him for healing and help, and he too became of those who looked and lived.

As the brazen serpent story pictures conversion, the story of Paul at Malta (Acts 28) shaking off into the fire the deadly serpent that had fastened on him, but could not poison him, pictures the Christian life, in which we must make ourselves immune by holding fast the spirit of Christ, and by promptly shaking off every evil thought and desire that fastens even for a moment upon mind or heart.

"You don't like Old Testament lessons? You think the New Testament so much better?" But you cannot even understand the New without the Old. What would anyone make of Christ's illustration, "As Moses lifted up the serpent," if the Old Testament was cast aside. The very passages that "critics" slur the most are the ones that Christ quotes as true and useful. The story of Jonah, of Lot's wife, of the flood, of Sodom, of the brazen serpent. Let us never forget the Old Testament; the very books we have were "the Saviour's Bible." He quoted its histories as true and its laws as decisions of the Supreme Court. As Paul said of the law, it is the school-master to bring us to Christ.

Sins of the Tongue

III. THE SAD SIDE OF THE COAL STRIKE

OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

A PROVERB of Anthracite says, "Once a man, twice a boy." This means that the declining years of every miner's life are spent in the same place where his first experience of the mine began. He starts in the breaker and he ends there. His life is like the circumference of a circle, whose centre is the mine. He cannot change his vocation. He cannot escape. This is one of the peculiar conditions of the mining industry. In almost every other trade, if a man were to become dissatisfied, he could either follow his trade in some other part of the country, or he could leave it altogether. But this the miner cannot do. Nowhere else is there a demand for him and for his services save in the land where he works. He has neither the education nor the adaptability to learn another trade. He must remain in the coal vein, a miner. As a boy in a mining town grows to manhood, he can have few amusements and little out-of-door exercise. Base-ball and tag cannot be played in the breakers. If the town is near a large city, the miner's boy sometimes belongs to the local Young Men's Christian Association, and occasionally is enrolled in a class at night-school. But his mind and body are too weary after ten hours work in the coal dust, to stand the strain of much mental effort. Even if (as is rarely the case), the mining town boasts of a public library or reading room, it is of little use to the breaker boy, for the simple reason that he cannot read. His usual evening pastime is attending the meetings of the local union, of which he is a member from his earliest childhood. Here he listens to strenuous discussions of labor problems. Just at the age he replied, "They don't drink now, simply because they are starving."

Twelve thousand Polish and Hungarian miners belong to a Roman Catholic temperance society. This means that a tenth of the men now on strike are pledged to totally abstain from strong drink. Almost every Protestant church, too, has its temperance society, and to the influence and example of these Christian temperance miners I am inclined to ascribe the lack of drunkenness in Anthracite, although, in expressing this opinion, I differ with the Company's view of the case.

To my mind, shiftlessness and improvidence are far worse faults of the miner than intemperance. About twice in every year a miner has what he calls a "pay week." When the vein of coal in which he is working is easy to mine, when cars are furnished to him as fast as he wants them, and when he has few props to place in position, at the end of a "pay week" his envelope contains from twice to three times the usual amount of wages. It never seems to occur to the miner that it would be a good thing for him to deposit this money in a savings bank, or to preserve it for future needs. It burns a hole in his pocket, and he hastens to spend it as soon as possible. With the profits of a "pay week," he buys silk dresses for his wife, which, in the sooty town, are a foolish extravagance. He insists on a gold-plated watch and chain for himself, or he takes his boys to the horse races, with a dinner at an expensive restaurant afterwards. The Company points to the miner throwing away his money and says, "That is the striker. He wants higher wages in order that he can make more of a fool of himself. Oh no. Money isn't a good thing for him. He is so ignorant that he is hopeless."

It is a sad strike that prevails in Anthracite to-day. In its outward signs, there is none of the enthusiasm nor fierce intensity of strikes, to which dwellers in American cities have become accustomed. The coal-miner's strike is negative, not active. Thus far, few acts of violence have been committed, and it is safe to prophecy that, however long the strike may last, and whatever may be its outcome, no property or life will be endangered. They are too sullenly dispirited to resort to violence. One pale-faced and hollow-cheeked miner and his wife, to whom I spoke, were drinking tea made from dandelions, which they had gathered in the fields. They had tasted no meat for a month. Herbs and roots had become important articles of food with them. No matter how bitterly such a miner may long for a blow at the Company or its property, he has neither the mental nor physical strength for the effort.

In the present strike, almost the only weapon used by the miner is the "boycott." It is doubtful, if ever before in the history of the country, has a system of boycotting been enforced to the extent it is to-day in Anthracite. A recent Pennsylvania law has made the use of the word "scab," as applied to a non-union workman, an offense punishable with a heavy fine, so that strikers have substituted the gentler epithet of "unfair man," which means the same thing. An "unfair man" simply cannot exist in Anthracite. No boarding-house will give him shelter, no grocer will sell him provisions, no barber will shave him, not even a saloon-keeper will accept his money for a drink. The boycott of non-union labor is everywhere. Every boarder at the house where I stayed at Edwarsville, had left because the landlady had inadvertently taken as a boarder an "unfair man." "Of course," she explained to me, "when I found out who he was, I threw his trunk out of the window, and I hit him with a brick besides; but my boarders all quit, just the same, because they said it would not do for them as Union men to sleep under a roof under which an 'unfair man' had lived."

Even school-teachers are boycotted. In every mining town there is a district school, whose small size and inadequate accommodations attests the small number of children who attend it. The members of the local school board of necessity are miners, because miners comprise the entire population. By a recent agreement of local unions, no man or woman, no matter how well qualified, can hold a position of teacher in a miner's district school, unless he or she be the son or daughter of a miner in good standing in his Union.

The boycott extends to the churches. This sad, bitter strike is turning the miner against religion. It is a great mistake to suppose that the miner is irreligious, and that he takes no heed of spiritual things. On the contrary, the proportion of miners who are members of churches and professing Christians is larger than among any other trade I have ever known. It is true that some miners are socialists, but very few are agnostics or infidels. Nearly all the Poles, Hungarians and Bohemians are Romanists, and the Welsh, English and Scotch and their children are equally devout in upholding the Protestant faith, which they or their fathers brought with them across the sea. Almost without exception, the best building in a mining town is the Methodist, Congregational or Baptist Church, built from the money that poorly paid miners have contributed from their wages. The clergymen, especially of the Welsh churches, have usually left their native land in order to minister to the spiritual needs of their countrymen in Anthracite. The churches are in no sense missions, but are supported and maintained entirely by the miners themselves. Besides being the spiritual centre, the church is usually the only intellectual light the mining town possesses. It is here that, once a year, the Welsh miners hold the festival of their singing societies, and sometimes engage distinguished musicians to come from far-away New York to take part in the programme.

Since the strike began, several of the miners' ministers are said to have spoken in favor of the Company's side of the controversy. I am disposed to believe that the miner's charges against his pastor are founded only on his own super-sensitiveness and prejudice. The miner's minister is, I believe, the miner's best friend; but whatever may be the merits of the case, the miner now believes that his minister is against him and, in consequence, he is against his minis-when boys should be wearing short jackets and playing marbles, the breaker boy is learning about the "Tyranny of Capital," and the "Workingman's Chains," and all the rest of the sad phrases.

"Are you striking, too?" I asked a breaker boy. "Sure," he replied. "I'm standing up for de rights o' man." He could not have been a day over nine years old. His answer would have been amusing if it had not been so sad.

There is one advantage in Company ownership of all the land in a mining town. It prevents the existence within the community of saloons. Just in the same way that the Company will not permit a competing store or a house owned by anyone other than themselves, so they will allow no liquor to be sold in their towns. When a miner wants drink, he must take the train or the trolley car to the nearest town. In a town where some of the land is not owned by individuals, there are more saloons in proportion to the number of the population than any other kind of stores or shops. Miners spend a large part of their hard-earned wages for drink, and this fact is frequently used against them in controversies with the Company. Yet the miner is not the habitual drunkard that he is often accused of being. In all the mining towns I visited I did not see a drunken man. The saloons are favorite lounging places for idle strikers. The office of the local Union in Edwarsville is across the street from a saloon, whose rear room is used for committee meetings. Occasionally in a saloon one might find a striking miner drinking, but nowhere did I see a man in Anthracite under the influence of liquor.

When I mentioned this fact to a Company sympathizer, ter, against his religion, and against his God. Since the strike began there has been a great falling off in church attendance, and the feeling of rebellion against the Company has extended to the minister.

With his voice choking with emotion, an old Welsh miner, who for more than twenty years has not missed a service at the church in his town, said to me:

"Our pastor, he war our friend, man. He stood by us in our troubles. He buried our dead. He married our childer. A mine boss, he tak' an interest in the church. He wor' worth eight millions' dollars. What for do he care for the church, but for to lead our pastor awa' from oos and to break our hearts? When the strike is coomin', the mine boss g'ies the pastor money for to tak' a trip to the land whar our Saviour walked. The pastor took the money and he go. We don't begrudge him his vacation, he needed it. He war worn out with coal dust. But our pastor feels kindly to the mine boss what give him the money. Poor man, he can naw understand that war what he had the vacation for, so 'at he'd no more see the good in oos, but in the boss."

"He preaches a sermon against the Union. He say the Company war all right for to starve oos, and to keep oos down. We boycotted him. We goes to his church naw more. Now he is preaching against them what stays away from service. He says for them is eternal death. May be the pastor has the right o' it. But I tell ye, man, I war one what voted in the Union to boycott the church, because the difference bechuckst hell and the mine ain't much, man."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

H. W., New York, writes:

The following note was sent me by a dear niece, who has, to my knowledge, been a Sunday School teacher over thirty years. I send her my paper regularly. "I want to give thanks in the 'Answered Prayer' column for the removal of a great anxiety and trouble. I sought the Lord and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears."

Subscriber, Alabama, writes:

I have been a subscriber to your paper for ten or twelve years, and wish to say in your columns, that have much cause for gratitude and thanks to the dear Lord for answers to my fervent prayers.

A. R., Kinsley, Kans., writes:

I have been praying that a very dear friend would have his heart touched, and give up drink. I am happy to say my prayer has been answered. I want to acknowledge God's goodness that others may take heart.

F. C. W., a reader, North Carolina, writes:

I write to give thanks to God for answering my prayers for special blessings—employment, and wisdom to do my daily tasks. And I can testify that he has heard when I have asked in faith and in the name of his dear Son, who said, "Whatsoever you ask in my name I will do it." God will surely answer us if we ask in faith.

S. G. M., Indianola, Miss., writes:

I have been helped so much by reading answers to prayer that I would like to encourage others by my experience. I have every reason to hope that God has heard and answered a petition that I have kept before him for thirty years.

J. M., Corydon, Iowa, writes:

In reading "Answered Prayers," I came to think more on the power of prayer, and prayed earnestly for the conversion of a dear brother. My prayer was answered, and this brother rejoices in newness of life, for which I thank Him every day.

Believer, Dublin, Pa., writes:

I passed through many dark hours of trouble in a short time. I earnestly prayed to God and he has marvelously delivered me. He is the same God to-day as when he delivered the three men out of the fiery furnace.

Wife and mother, Topeka, Kan., writes:

I prayed that a dear one might be kept from peril. That dear one has been kept safe.

S. M., Pine Village, Ind., writes:

God bless you in all the work you are doing for the hearts receiving comfort through "Answered Prayers." Jesus does hear and answer prayer. I have read your paper for twenty-five years. I have found help in it.

H., Portsmouth, Va., writes:

I wish to acknowledge that God has graciously answered my prayers for my husband.

Growth of the Lighthouse League

Expressions of interest in The Lighthouse League continue to come in. The card of membership is appreciated and valued; present members are endeavoring to secure additional ones, and many write: "I will do what I can to help." One writes: "Some things in Lighthouse Series No. 2 give me fresh encouragement," in her endeavor to win a person to Christ. Others state they are praying for the Bowery Mission. The old mission will increase rapidly in influence and power to do good, with the added help of new and old friends. The League should number at least 5,000 before January 1st. All who desire to add their names to the list, should communicate with the Lighthouse League, care THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

Arbitration the Remedy

IT is a sad and depressing page of industrial history that is now being recorded in the Pennsylvania coal regions. Over 150,000 men idle, with probably half a million dependants; millions of dollars needlessly lost on both sides; a large section of the State given over to lawlessness; terrorism and suffering widespread and increasing. And all these troubles brought about because of the refusal to submit this miserable dispute to arbitration. Already the quarrel has made itself felt beyond the lines of State jurisdiction, and it has become a question whether the stoppage of coal production, with the consequent cessation of coal transportation between States, is not a matter which legitimately concerns other States besides Pennsylvania. People have a right to ask whether any one State should have the power to inflict privation upon distant communities, to impair manufacturing and transportation activities, and to cause general loss, inconvenience and suffering, through its peculiar methods of dealing with one of the leading necessities of life.

Unfortunately for the consumer, there is no immediate ray of hope in the situation. Hard as is the lot of the coal miner, he is evidently resolved to stand out indefinitely against what he regards as the oppression of the operators; and the latter, equally determined, will neither concede nor arbitrate. Coal prices are still soaring upward, and the prediction that the consumer may have to pay ten dollars a ton for his winter supply seems not unlikely to be verified. Large numbers of workmen engaged in railroad transportation and other industries dependent on the coal supply, are idle. In every city in the Eastern and Middle States, murky, unwholesome clouds of soft coal smoke overhang the factories and poison the atmosphere, and there is a temporary abrogation of existing laws directed against the nuisance. With the advent of colder weather, the situation, if unrelieved, will be serious indeed.

It would be almost impossible to find a more cogent argument in favor of a national Arbitration Act than the present strike. If conditions cannot be made to fit existing laws, laws should be devised to meet the conditions. A National Board of Arbitration, as a tribunal of appeal from State Boards of Arbitration, has already been suggested in various quarters. Whatever form such legislation might take, it is clear that the subject is one which cannot much longer be neglected, for the sake of the general welfare, and in the interest of justice to both sides in such controversies. It may not be practicable to make arbitration compulsory, but it could at all events be made so readily available that it would naturally be resorted to, as the solvent in all such quarrels as the present unfortunate one in Pennsylvania.

"I Can Worship God at Home"

PEOPLE say they can worship God at home as well as in church. No doubt they can, though it may be doubted whether those who urge that excuse for "forsaking the assembling of themselves together," do actually worship God at home. Besides, that does not fulfil the Word of God, nor meet the necessities of spiritual life.

You know that when several chemical substances are put together in a jar, properties appear in the combination which were not found in the separate elements. The color, the taste, the quality is different. What was latent in the elements, becomes apparent in the compound; what was dormant in the parts is active in the whole.

So, when we worship together as members one of another, the uniting of hearts, and minds, and voices is not merely the mechanical summing up of so many separate capabilities; rather it is the chemical development, as it were, of a new and different power; a joy, a peace, a light, a warmth, an inspiration which the risen Lord imparts only when he stands in the midst of those assembled in his name.

Home-Comings

HOME-COMINGS should never be flat. Yet often when people have been away on a visit or a trip, full of pleasurable excitements, full of novelties, and changeful delights, they have a very distinct feeling of ennui, of flatness, in returning home. They settle down to the old humdrum routine, as if they had never been away. The home folk, who have been working steadily in the old rut, keeping a sober jog-trot do not mind the dullness, and if they observe that the home-comers are low in their minds they think how unfair it is, and how stupid. Yet, sensible mothers who plan to make the young people happy, really try to have every home-coming a sort of festival. The prodigal's father welcomed him with the fatted calf, while to the elder son, who had been at home in all worthiness, he paid no special attention.

Churlish as the elder brother was, there are those who have sympathized in his complaint on this occasion. But, one needs not be a prodigal to be welcomed with songs and flowers, and the nicest dinner and some very sweet surprise when one comes home. Such a welcome fits the home-returning child to take hold of life's commonplaces with new enthusiasm.

The Bible in the Schools

THE question raised by Mr. Moses H. Sydenham, in the letter published in this journal last week, is one of the most difficult of educational problems. He strongly advocated the study of the Bible in our public schools, and cited the speech recently delivered at the Annual Convention of the National Educational Association by President Butler, of Columbia University, in support of his proposal. The evil which Mr. Sydenham deplors is a very serious one. He says that the children, "while crammed with all sorts of other kinds of knowledge, have come out of the schools agnostics and materialists." That is a very grave charge, and there is reason to fear that it has a basis of truth. Agnosticism and materialism are increasing, but the fault does not lie altogether with the schools. They were not established to teach religion, but to impart secular knowledge. It is as unreasonable to blame the schools for the child's religious attitude, as it would be for a father to blame a carpenter to whom he had apprenticed his boy to learn the carpentry trade, because he had not also taught the boy to set type. Nor does Doctor Butler's proposal remove the difficulty. He would have the Bible studied in the schools, but not "for religious instruction, nor the promotion of theology." It is simply as a classic, as literature, that he would use the Bible, and when its use is so restricted, we greatly doubt if it would prevent the increase of agnosticism and materialism. To treat the Bible as a text-book, to analyze its composition, to explain its beauties of diction, might be useful as a study of English, but to arouse an admiration for the mere human construction of the Book, would do little toward impressing on the child's mind its divine authority. Even the eighth resolution adopted by the convention, which Mr. Sydenham quotes with triumph, explicitly defines the Bible teaching proposed as the study of the Bible as "a literary work of the highest and purest type." But it is not as a literary work that the Bible exerts its most potent influence, and a child may come out of the schools admiring the diction of the Bible above Homer or Virgil, without any disposition to conform his life to its teaching. Let the Bible be studied by all means; let the children be familiarized with it; but all such study must be supplemented by the teaching of its authority as the Word of God, if we would have them made wise unto salvation.

The reason that children grow up agnostics, is not in the defects of their school teaching, so much as in the lack of home training. The parent ought not to delegate the moral and religious development of his child to the public school-teacher. He has a right to look to his church for help in the work, but first and last the responsibility is his own, and it largely rests with him what is the moral and religious standing of his child.

Among the Workers

—REV. A. H. CROSS, of the Erie County Sunday School Association, writes: "At East Aurora, N. Y., we have a most interesting work. There is a Going-Out Band at this place which has done splendid work. It started with two or three men, and now they have some twenty people who go to visit the different Sunday Schools round about, and assist wherever they can. They have a covered wagon, a folding organ, and singing books."

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Divine Adoption

—"BEHOLD WHAT manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." It matters not how poor our garments may be in this world, or how scant our bread, or how mean the hut we live in; if we have that ring of Christ's adoption upon our hand, we are assured of eternal defenses. Adopted! Why, then, we are brothers and sisters to all the good of earth and heaven. We have the family name, the family dress, the family keys, the family wardrobe. The Father looks after us, robes us, defends us, blesses us. We have royal blood in our veins, and there are crowns in our line. If we are his children, then princes and princesses. It is only a question of time when we get our coronet. Adopted! Then we have the family secrets. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Adopted! Then we have the family inheritance; in the day when our Father shall divide the riches of heaven, we shall take our share of the mansions and palaces and temples. Henceforth let us boast no more of an earthly ancestry. The insignia of eternal glory are our coat of arms.

Imperishable Influence

—MEN DIE, but their work lives on. We are all building pyramids, not to last four thousand years, but forty thousand, forty million, forty trillion, forty quadrillion, forty quintillion. For awhile we wield the trowel, or pound with the hammer, or measure with the yard-stick, or write with the pen, or experiment with the scientific battery, or plan with the brain; and for a while the foot walks and the eye sees and the ear hears and the tongue speaks. All the good words or bad words we speak are spread out into one layer for a pyramid. All the kind deeds or malevolent deeds we do are spread out into another layer. All the Christian or unchristian example we set is spread out in another layer. All the indirect influences of our lives are spread out in another layer. Then the time soon comes when we put down the implement of toil and pass away, but the pyramid stands. The twentieth century will not rock it down, nor the thirtieth century, nor the one hundredth century. The earthquake that rocks this world to pieces will not stop our influence for good or evil.

The Cry of Dead Cities

—I NOTICE the voice of ancient cities is hoarse from the exposure of forty centuries, and they accentuate slowly with lips that were palsied for ages, but altogether those cities along the Nile intone these words, "Hear us, for we are very old, and it is hard for us to speak. We were wise long before Athens learned her first lesson. We sailed our ships while yet navigation was unborn. We sinned and we fell. Our learning could not save us—see those half-obliterated hieroglyphics on yonder wall. Our architecture could not save us—see the painted columns of Philæ. Our heroes could not save us: witness Menes, Diodorus, Rameses and Ptolemy. Our gods Ammon and Osiris could not save us—see their fallen temples all along the four thousand miles of Nile. Oh, ye modern cities, get some other God than ours—a God who can help, a God who can pardon, a God who can save. Called up as we are for a little while to give testimony, again the sands of the desert will bury us. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust!" And as these voices of porphyry and granite ceased, all the sarcophagi under the hills responded, "Ashes to ashes!" and the capital of a lofty column fell, grinding itself to powder among the rocks, and responding, "Dust to dust!"

The Millennial Morning

—O YOU DEAD churches, wake up! Throw back the shutters of stiff ecclesiasticism, and let the light of the spring morning come in! Morning for the land. Morning for the sea. Morning of emancipation. Morning of light and love and peace. Morning of a day in which there shall be no chains to break, no sorrows to assuage, no despotism to shatter, no woes to compassionate. O Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown! Bruised hand, take the sceptre! Wounded foot, step the throne! "Thine is the kingdom."

Solace for Heartbreak

O TROUBLED SOUL! I want to tell you that there is one salve that can cure the wounds of the heart, and that is the salve made out of the tears of a sympathetic Jesus. And yet some of you will not take this solace; and you try chloral and you try morphine and you try strong drink and you try change of scene and you try new business associations and anything and everything rather than take Divine companionship and sympathy. Oh! that you might understand something of the height and depth and length and breadth and immensity and infinity of God's eternal consolations.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Europe to America by Land

NEWS has been received from Dawson City, Alaska, of the arrival there of an exploring party who set out from Paris last December to reach

HARRY DE WINDT

New York by land. Mr. Harry de Windt is the leader of the party. Of course, he was fully aware that the most direct route from France to America was to cross the Atlantic, but he believed that if he could demonstrate that it was possible to travel overland between the two places, a railroad might eventually be laid, which would enormously develop international commerce. His route from Paris was northward to Moscow, and thence northward to the great Siberian railroad, by which he could reach Irkutsk and Nijni Kolymsk to the Behring Straits. He hoped to be able to cross on the ice to the American continent, and thence proceed eastward to New York. The only gap in the overland journey appears to have occurred at Behring Straits. Mr. de Windt was detained by the wild tribes of a Siberian village, who held him prisoner so long that when he reached Behring Straits, the ice had broken up so that he could not cross on it. Full details of the journey have not yet arrived, so it is not known what he did in the emergency, but it is stated by people who know the straits, that he could easily cross in a native skin-boat. It would appear, therefore, that his object of demonstrating the possibility of an overland journey has been practically achieved. He has shown that widely separated as the continents are at the equator, they meet at the poles. Now if we could learn how to achieve that other and better triumph, beside which commerce and travel are as nothing, which the prophet described, this old world would enter on a new era.

All the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God (Isa. 52: 10).

A Daughter Identified

By the decision of the judge of the District Court of New Orleans, a girl fourteen years of age has been surrendered to her father, who has only recently learned of her existence. During his absence from his home at Cheniere Cammada, in October, 1893, a terrific storm desolated the Louisiana coast. His wife and child were swept out to sea, and he believed that both were drowned. Recently one of his servants called his attention to a girl in New Orleans bearing a strong resemblance to the family. Inquiries were made about her, and it was found that the couple with whom she lived and who she supposed to be her parents, had adopted her from a children's home in Mississippi. At the Home, a further investigation was made, with the result of tracing the child to the possession of a fisherman, who lived in the Lake Borgne Swamp. The foster-parents of the child were reluctant to give her up, and it became necessary for the father to sue for her recovery. He had no evidence to show that she was his daughter, except her striking resemblance to his other children, who were absent from home when the storm destroyed his home nine years ago. That evidence, however, appears to have convinced the judge, who has given the girl into his charge. One could wish that in the children of God the spiritual resemblance were as clearly marked, so that wherever they are, they might be recognized by their disposition and conduct as belonging to his family.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another (John 13: 35).

A Floating Telegraph Station

A novel application of the Marconi system has been adopted off the English coast. A vessel has been moored about a hundred miles west of the Lizard. It has been fitted with the wireless telegraph apparatus, and has on board a powerful searchlight. With her light illuminating the clouds this vessel will be easily "picked up," even at night, from a distance of sixty miles, and, situated right in the fairway of the Channel, it is expected that great advantage will be derived from the time at once began to shadow the man. He found that he went every day at lunch time to a restaurant where there was a telephone, and that he spent most of the hour in the telephone booth and ate very little at the tables. He concluded that he was in communication with a stockbroker. In the evening after the bank closed he followed him, but the teller eluded him, so the detective watched his home. Seeing a little girl there the detective asked her if she knew the teller. The child replied: "He is my papa. He will be home in a few minutes. He always stops to see the doctor after he leaves the bank, because mamma is very ill, and we are afraid she will die. The doctor comes every noon and telephones to papa and then he stops there on his way home. If you will come in you won't have long to wait, or you can call again, for he never leaves mamma after he comes home, and sits up all night with her." Doubtless the effect of his loving self-sacrifice on his appearance and manner did resemble the effect of dissipation, and the fact shows how careful we should be not to misjudge others or to draw cruel inferences from appearances.

Judge not, that ye be not judged (Matt. 7: 1).

Preacher, a Day Laborer

The pastor of a Congregational Church at Carthage, Mo., has adopted a novel method of spending a six-weeks' vacation. He has obtained employment in the construction gang which is building the new on board fifty-three men and eleven women, who were coming to join the Portuguese colony, near Providence, R. I. It was a large number for so small a vessel as the Notice, but they were made as comfortable as the limited accommodations would permit. All went well until July 21, when a sudden squall struck the vessel and dismasted her. Stormy weather continued all that day and during the following night. In the morning it was found that the rudder had been torn out. The vessel was then utterly helpless and drifted at the mercy of the waves. The situation was rendered more desperate by the death of the captain, who, in a fit of despair, jumped overboard. Nine days and nights the schooner with her passengers was tossed about before the Italian steamer came to her rescue. Her condition was like that of unconverted men who are helpless to save themselves, having no guide or power; but unlike the schooner, they can get aid at any moment, from One mighty to save.

His ears are open to their cry (Ps. 34: 15).

BRIEF NOTES

One of the anomalies of the marriage law is found in the State of Victoria, Australia. There a man may marry his deceased wife's sister, but a woman may not marry her deceased husband's brother.

The Pope has withdrawn the endorsement he gave some time ago to the work of a French officer who rendered the Gospels in the modern language of his countrymen. It is said that the interest excited in the book alarmed certain influential prelates who lodged complaints at the Vatican.

Three hundred and ninety-seven children, most of them orphans, collected by Dr. Barnardo from the slums of English cities, arrived in Boston on the steamer New England last week, en route for Canada, where they will be placed with respectable families.

It is gratifying to learn that Archdeacon Moule has sufficiently recovered from his illness to return to China. It is said that nothing could have buoyed up the venerable man but the assurance that if he recovered he should resume his labors in the land for the evangelization of which he has given his life.

There will be convened at Lakeside, Ohio, August 26 to September 1, a Congregational distribution of orders sent from shore by owners for vessels passing in or out. As a reporting station to be approached in any state of the weather, for the purpose of transmitting important information, the value of the vessel will be large, while as a salving station, lying as she does at the junction of the three great streams of British and Continental traffic, she should have many opportunities of rendering assistance to vessels in distress. Mariners will surely avail themselves of this means of communication with the land, and if they are in need of help their need will be quickly known and supplied. If men would only realize that supernatural help may also be obtained as surely, how many troubles might be saved them!

They cried unto thee, and were delivered; they trusted in thee, and were not confounded (Ps. 22: 5).

A Bank Teller Vindicated

A detective recently told a story of his professional work that carries an important lesson of charitable judgment. He was sent for to St. Louis, Mo., by the president of a bank, who told him that the directors had become suspicious of their teller, who appeared to be laboring under excitement and showed signs of late hours and dissipation. The detec-roadbed between Carthage and Asbury for the Carthage and Western Railroad. He was raised on a farm and is well developed. He is hardening his muscle, whetting his appetite and toning up his nerve tissue by good, honest work. One day he was put at work mowing weeds from the right of way. Another day, he was driving a mule team hauling stone. He says his object in thus spending his vacation is to mingle with the men and get thoroughly in touch with the laboring classes, with a view to learning their attitude on religious matters and doing them good. He thinks a year's reading would not compare with the benefit to be secured in his six weeks of association with the men in their work. By becoming one of them he is likely to understand their need and adapt his preaching to it. In this he follows his Lord's example.

Who made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men (Phil. 2: 7).

Rescue of a Schooner

The Italian Mail Line steamer Sardigna arrived in New York Harbor a few days ago with the schooner Notice in tow. The latter vessel left Brava, one of the Cape Verde Islands, on June 27, having Summer Bible College under the auspices of the Ohio State Association of Congregational Churches, where ministers, laymen and Christian workers generally will meet for rest, mutual acquaintance, fellowship and instruction.

Professor Sayce, in his Witness of the Ancient Monuments, says: "In every case where we can test the Bible story by contemporaneous monuments, the authenticity of which is doubted by no one, we find it confirmed and explained, even in the minutest points."

The annual report of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions shows that in 1901, 5,241 adults were baptized into the Presbyterian Church in mission fields, 749 missionaries at work, 26,108 scholars in mission schools, 289,369 patients treated in hospitals, and 75,011,660 pages issued from the mission presses.

The Conference at Winona Lake, Ind., for young people engaged in Sunday School work, has proved a complete success. It has been decided to hold one annually at the same place. Dr. H. M. Hamill, of Nashville, Tenn., has promised to take charge of a model training school there every summer, the instruction to be entirely gratuitous.

The responsible officials of the Methodist Episcopal Church South have decided to endeavor to raise a $5,000,000 endowment fund, the interest of which is to go to ministers incapacitated for work and to the widows and orphans of clergymen who died in the harness. This is an example that we hope will be extensively followed.

Dr. Levi B. Salmans, the famous medical missionary at Guanajuato, Mexico, has now two of his own students assisting him in his extensive work. In a recent letter he speaks most hopefully of the progress of the work. He is returning to this country for a brief visit to arrange for the education of his children, all of whom he hopes will become medical missionaries.

Think of the Children

MARRIED people who cannot agree, and who fancy that a cure for their lack of harmony would be found in separation, should think of their children. Parents cannot consider themselves alone. The divorce courts, with their record of wrecked and blasted lives, entail a sequence of remorseful tears for the severed family ties in days to come. When a child, unmothered or unfathered, not by the death of either, but through their sinful infidelity or evil temper reaches adolescence, he or she asks questions; is apt to judge severely; is sure to take sides. During childhood, those unfortunate little beings whose parents have selfishly sought relief from uncongeniality in divorce, are unfavorably compared with other children, and have many a pang. Parents, before you suffer anything to separate you, think of your children.

A Common Complaint

"Before I was married, I worked in an office. I had a good salary, and was independent. Since my marriage, I have worked just as hard in another way, but I never have a dollar of my own."

Until husbands and wives appreciate the fact that they are partners in business, and that each has a right to share in the profits, and each a right to some share of the capital, this complaint will be made. More absolute wretchedness on the part of married women springs from this single infelicity than from any other. Especially in the case of a teacher, a stenographer, a wage-earner, who has had a personal income, the change in marriage to infantile dependence, often to inconvenient penury, owing to the man's grasp of the purse-strings, is a terribly wearing one.

Little Ethel Roosevelt

Ethel Roosevelt, the twelve-year-old daughter of the President, is, like all the White House children, a person of much individuality. The Roosevelt children have the great advantage of being brought up by a very sensible mother, and they show traits which are very endearing and charming. Not long since, Ethel heard Madame Susie Sorabji tell about the children in India, and their great needs, and at once she and her little friends decided to send some money to help the missionaries care for them. Instead of asking for money from their parents, each little girl denied herself something from her own allowance. Ethel denied herself candy for a month, and each other girl gave up, on her part, some usually coveted indulgence, the result being a generous sum, which has gone to the missionary treasury for little children in India.

Lowered Vitality

When you tire easily and without cause; when you find yourself growing thin and pale, and, above all, when you are aware that you are fretful and cross and hard to live with, seek for the cause. It may be in a lowered state of vitality. Insidiously, the tone may fall below concert pitch, and by the time that you need reserve strength for some emergency, it may be exhausted. People fall ill, or die suddenly, months before the fever came, or the stroke, nature was hanging out her danger signals and in every possible way urging them to be careful, but they would not heed. A tonic to-day may save one from nervous prostration to-morrow. Rest for a week now, may preserve one from a prolonged fit of sickness next month. Be wise in time.

Slang

Slang indicates poverty of vocabulary. It is never an elegant mode of speech, although it is sometimes rather picturesque. But worse than slang are such expressions as "Land's sakes!" "Where the Dickens?" "Gracious goodness!" "Kingdom come!" and similar expressions which fall from the lips of uncultivated people. "Good land o' living!" exclaimed a well-dressed woman in conversation the other day, thus expressing surprise, and showing herself uneducated and indeed illiterate. Our language is sufficiently rich and flexible to prevent any need for resort to slang, or to foolish exclamatory phrases.

The Opinion of a Farmer's Daughter

Apropos of a little talk with our readers on the subject of summer boarders, a few weeks since, a farmer's daughter has a word by way of rejoinder:

"Summer boarders want as cheap rates as they can get; then they expect the best of everything. They eat all your cream and butter, fruit and vegetables. Everything must be in apple-pie order. They spoil your books, tear your pictures, yet keep you on a continual run to keep your house straight. They even expect you to wait on them, and because they pay for their board, they consider you are hardly fit company for them; they show you plainly how far above you they feel. The exceptions to this are few.

"If you go to the country for the summer, leave your pride and fine clothes and jewels at home, and go to have a good time. If you have a good place appreciate it, and let your landlady know that you do."

There are suggestions here which some among summer boarders may very well heed. I hope that only a few of our circle need them.

A Steady Head

There is everything in keeping a steady head in an emergency. Presence of mind is a rare endowment, and one that should be cultivated, since, like every other habit, it is under the control of the will. In a sudden exigency, the man with a steady head knows just what to do, sees the various possibilities, and at once proceeds to do the best thing by way of remedy.

WHEN THE COWS COME HOME

The velvet shadows on the slopes are lying long and golden, The birds are flying to their nests, the bees unto the hive; In many a peaceful hillside place, the gentle lambs are folded, And oh! it is such joy to be here in the fields alive, And down the lanes, the cows come home, Brindle and Bess and Bonny, The very air is fragrant and the flowers are full of honey.

The Forward Educational Movement in China

CHINA, the most conservative and least progressive of nations, since the convulsion of 1900, is swinging into line with the march of the great peoples. That strange, cruel, sagacious woman, the Empress Dowager, a combination of Jezebel, Lady Macbeth, and Catharine of Russia, observes that Western men have success, and puts it down to Western education. Therefore she orders, by proclamation, the instant founding of schools, colleges, and universities for Western learning, in each provincial capital, and further commands that gifted Chinese students shall be sent abroad to study at the expense of the Empire. Her edict is as yet handicapped by an order to offer sacrifices to Confucius and other former holy teachers and worthies. So long as this remains imperative, Christian students and Christian professors must stand aloof from the new learning. Mr. Robert E. Lewis, Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. at Shanghai, is sanguine that the breaking of a new literary day is coming to China, that its old, cumbersome machinery of study will soon be a thing of the past, and that the best classes of the Empire will be those who shall seek the enlightenment of the West.

What Shall She Wear?

The little girl is going to the country to have a pleasant outing. For many reasons, mother dear, let her be free from the restraints of her nicest clothes. Put on her simple woolen frock on cold mornings, her gingham or percale on warm ones, and let her trot off to play, without a single fear of tearing, or staining, or injuring a garment. I pity children who are early made to suffer from the tyranny of clothing. The dainty frills and furbelows, the satins and laces which some mothers put on their poor little children, as if they were puppets on which to hang finery, are excessively inappropriate, and interfere with the children's enjoyment, besides cultivating vanity.

The Kaiser's Little Daughter

Little Louise, the only daughter of the Kaiser, and his youngest child, is a great pet with father, mother, and her six brothers. She is the only person in the empire who may commit the blunder of lese-majeste without fear of condign punishment. "Louise," says the Emperor, "never forgets that she is the daughter of an emperor, but she sometimes forgets that her father is the emperor." She is a sweet little princess; will be brought up according to the German ideal, to be a perfect housekeeper; is musical, and promises to be a fine pianiste, and also a daring horse-woman.

DR. TEMPLE, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, PLACING THE CROWN ON THE HEAD OF THE KING

THE CORONATION OF KING EDWARD VII.

SHORN in some measure of its intended magnificence, the Coronation of King Edward VII., on August 9, was still a wondrous spectacle. In these days, no one supposes that the ceremony makes the central figure in it any the more a king than he was before. All the oaths and anointings and investitures are but symbols, but they are impressive, and they represent a conferring of authority and power which are more real in the British Empire than Americans are inclined to believe. The conferences of the representatives of the colonies, which have taken place in London during the past few weeks, have made it clear that it is the monarchy which holds the various parts of the Empire together. So independent have the colonies become, that it is not now necessary to submit the decisions of the various legislatures to the consideration of the Imperial Parliament. Loyalty to the throne is the one bond of union which all acknowledge. It is, therefore, natural and proper that the investiture of the monarch should be a stately and impressive ceremony. The disappointment caused by the King's sudden illness, which prevented the ceremony taking place on June 26, was borne by both the monarch and his people with patience. In the letter which the King addressed to the public on August 8, he gracefully acknowledged the sympathy manifested toward him. He also recorded his conviction that the prayers offered on his behalf had been heard, and expressed his "deepest gratitude to Divine Providence for having preserved his life and given him strength to fulfil the important duties which devolve upon him." That this was no mere formal expression, those who know the King best strongly affirm. They point to the fact that at the age of sixty-one years he recovered from a critical operation as an evidence that his life has been more free from excesses than common report indicated. Correspondents of American newspapers say that the celebration by the people lost nothing of its heartiness through the postponement. It was less noisy, but there was a personal element of sympathy and respect in it which made it deep and cordial. The representatives of foreign powers had departed, but the representatives of the colonies remained, as did the contingent from India, so that the ceremony had more of a family and national character than it would have had if it had taken place at the time originally planned. The streets through which the royal procession was to pass were crowded on Friday evening by persons who, being unable to pay the high price demanded for seats on the stands that had been erected, remained on the sidewalks all night that they might secure points of vantage. They witnessed the quaint ceremony of bringing the royal crowns and sceptres and orbs from the Tower, where they are kept, to Westminster Abbey. They were put in morocco cases, and were carried in royal carriages to the ancient church. Strong detachments of soldiery guarded the precious symbols, which are encrusted with jewels of fabulous value. In the Abbey, soldiers with drawn swords kept watch over them all night, and after the ceremony they were sent back under the same guard to the Tower, where they will remain until King Edward is gathered to his fathers, and his son reigns in his stead.

The scene in the Abbey was one of extraordinary magnificence. Peers in their gorgeous robes, wearing the coronets of their order, and their wives and daughters resplendent in their exquisite robes, and shining with priceless jewels, filled every part of the historic edifice, leaving only the nave clear for the procession of the King and Queen. There, in the open space, called a theatre, the two thrones were set, and beside them the chairs, beautifully upholstered and decorated with the royal arms, in which their majesties sat before the culmination of the ceremony, when the crowns were placed on their heads, and they were conducted to their respective thrones.

In consideration of the King's recent illness, the ceremony, which was fully described in this journal on June 11, was abbreviated. The long litany was omitted and other parts of the quaint programme were shortened, so as to bring the entire ceremony within the two hours which the King's physicians insisted should be the total length of the strain to which he should be subjected. The solemn questions and the responses were, of course, retained intact, and the anointing and investiture with sceptre, sword and orb were punctiliously observed.

It was noticed that the King appeared to be in better health than before the operation. He walked with a firm step, and his skin had a clear appearance under the coat of tan which he gained during his convalescence on his yacht. His responses were uttered in a clear, resonant tone, and were audible throughout the vast building. The Queen, too, who has won the hearts of all the nation by her gentle, graceful ways, her wifely affection and her sympathy with the sick and suffering among the people, had her full share of the popular ovation. The Prince and Princess of Wales, who are next in succession to the throne, were also cordially greeted and were cheered by the crowds, both in going to the Abbey and returning. Sitting next to the Prince during the ceremony was the venerable Duke of Cambridge, grandson of George III., and therefore cousin of Queen Victoria, who would have been king if she had not been born. He has, all through his life, been on the most cordial terms with his cousin and her children, who stood between him and the great inheritance of the throne. It is a great gratification to him that the daughter of his sister, who is married to the Prince of Wales, will, in the natural order of events, become Queen.

It is worthy of notice that the privilege of witnessing the Coronation, so ardently desired by the greatest families of the realm, many of whom had to be denied because of the limitations of space, was freely accorded to Bishop Hartzell, of Africa, who at the request of Ambassador Choate, received a cordial invitation. Another significant spectator was Bramwell Booth, eldest son of the Founder of the Salvation Army. It is stated that he was present at the King's special desire, and that when the Duke of Norfolk, who had charge of all details of costume, said that he could not recognize the uniform of the Salvation Army, the King brushed aside the objection and ordered that he be admitted in the uniform of his rank. One striking feature of the procession was a large silver cross, the gift of the King of Abyssinia, who presented it when King Edward's illness caused the postponement of the coronation. It was a votive offering, with prayers for his Majesty's recovery, and the King showed his appreciation of the barbaric gift and the cordial good feeling it symbolized, by having it carried in his procession.

So the sinister predictions of the soothsayers and the astrologers, who declared that King Edward would reign but would never be crowned, have proved false. At one time it looked as if they would be fulfilled, and we would have never ceased to hear of the value of such predictions. The ceremony has taken place, and the King appears to have borne it without injury to his health. His fortitude and his geniality have drawn his people nearer to him, and the prospects of his being a popular monarch are stronger now than before his illness. His admiration and appreciation for America are not forgotten on this side of the Atlantic, and in all friendliness and cordiality we may join in the plaudits of his subjects and say, God save King Edward.

HOW THE DEBT WAS PAID

...BY...
MARY C. FRANCIS

THE long, anxious week had slowly progressed to Saturday afternoon, and affairs were sluggishly shaping themselves. For the tormented young pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Milford, these few days had been an eternity.

Unsuspected to himself, a thousand hopes and ideals had centered around his work in this church, among and for his people. Freshly ordained, the solemnity of his ordination was still like a spiritual halo in his memory, the trail of the textbook still marked him for its own, and his powers were still nascent.

So it was that for more than a year he had presided over the spiritual destinies of the flock at Milford, his first charge, with all the ardor of one fresh in the fray.

Socially he had been surprisingly popular, though at first so shy that he was hard to cultivate, and early in his ministry he had told Elder Harris he thought seriously of celibacy as befitting the clergy.

Having said this, Katherine Travis straightway crossed his path, and the pale ghost of celibacy had quickly slunk away before the rosy dawn of love. Not for many days had he spoken, and now it was but forty-eight hours since he had felt the glow of finding his affection reciprocated. The blessed discovery had raised him to infinite heights, and that he could only cry out inarticulate thanks to God for the infinite blessing that had come into his life.

And yet, the path was not smooth. Hydra-headed difficulties stood in the way. The roads for the future seemed to divide, and at the parting of the ways he was perplexed. A light rain was falling. It was a quiet, colorless day. He lay at full length on a reclining chair in his room at Mrs. Brown's. He knew there was no one else in the house, and the thought gave him a vague satisfaction. If he could only stop thinking for twenty-four hours and then come back to it, he was sure he would decide rightly. What would his good friend Elder Howe say? What would Katherine say? What would Christ say? What did his own conscience say? What of love, of duty, of inclination? He covered his face with his hands and groaned.

The church at Milford was fairly well-to-do. The village was in the centre of a rich farming district, whose broad acres stretched smiling in the heart of a fertile belt bordering one of our great rivers, a section famous for its historical associations, and the majority of its membership might be reckoned as belonging to that great portion of the body politic, commonly alluded to by would-be statesmen as "the bone and sinew of the nation."

Yet for fifteen years the church had carried a debt of $1,000, on which six per cent. interest was annually due, without ever making one real attempt to lift it. They were sullen in selfishness and knew it not. More than one ardent, but incautious occupant of the Milford pulpit, met his Waterloo by attempting to accomplish where others had failed, and although one or two of the more spirited had attempted to bring the injustice of his treatment before the Presbytery for redress, the matter had been quickly silenced by a rich and influential elder, who knew the theological ropes as well as any ward healer ever knew his district.

And so the Milford church owed the beggarly little mortgage debt of $1,000, paid its six per cent. interest grudgingly, and its meagre salary of $700 coldly, and went its way, respectable, selfish, orthodox and un-Christian; and would have been scandalized by the suggestion that, as individual members, they were not models of every sanctified grace.

For some time the mortgage had been held by Dr. Brannon; the rich, eccentric widower who, since the death of his wife, whom he had idolized, had lived in solitary state in the big house on the hill. While his wife (who was a devoted communicant) had lived, Dr. Brannon, although not a church member, was so regular in his attendance, and so generous in his contributions, that he was justly regarded by the brethren as being practically one of the pillars of the church. But when she died, he became a changed man. His shadow darkened the entrance to the sacred edifice no more, and though at the beginning of each year he sent a check for a generous subscription "in memory of my wife," he declined all other appeals. More than that, he insisted on the prompt payment of the interest, greatly to the grief of certain of the elders.

Of late, Milford had been astonished to see the doctor at service on several occasions. Grimly silent he sat in a rear seat, stalking out in dignified reserve with the last word of the benediction, and replying to all attempts at welcome by the brethren only with a sardonic smile.

All these matters, in a thousand varying phases, the Rev. James Perry revolved as he lay uneasily trying to find his way. The matter of the debt had taken hold of his conscience. He felt it incumbent on him to cause it to be raised somehow. But how? Already he had had a significant hint dropped him by one of the members of the session that he had better not meddle with the matter, and when he had quickly replied that a natural pastoral interest was not open to the suspicion of "meddling," he had been promptly met by the chilling response that if he wanted to stay in Plainfield he had better look to the quality of his sermons, and let the business men of the church attend to financial affairs.

The young minister felt sorely galled. Here were limitations. Was it possible that the Cross of Christ could press into the spirit with so ignoble a bruise!

could rely upon her unwavering devotion to the cause of Christ, to stand by him in any struggle. The sooner they talked it over the better. He looked at his watch. The rain had ceased, and a red gleam from the declining sun streamed into the room. It seemed like a good omen. With a lighter heart he seized his hat and, within the next half hour, Katherine Travis knew the full, inner history of his spiritual travail.

"And now, dear," he concluded, "you know just how I feel about it. I have told you all, for I felt that I should lay the whole thing before you. Since, ere many months we shall be man and wife, this concerns you as much as it does me—would that it did not—and before taking the step I contemplate to-morrow morning, I should like you to approve of my purpose, and enter with me into the spirit of it. It will cheer my heart and inspire my tongue to-morrow, to look down into your eyes and feel that we are in harmony. Katherine, my own Katherine, what do you say?"

Katherine's heart swelled with conflicting emotions. With all a woman's imagination, she had pictured a future, frugal at first, but growing in prosperity with the years to a comfortable affluence—her husband's growing popularity, her own widening social influence, the surroundings of refinement—all that should by right enliven their pathway and make life desirable. And now, at the

we are longing for a little leeway. I know that the difference of a raise in your salary for one year cannot of itself entail all these upon us at once, but I see so plainly it is the first step toward it. It is not wise—it is folly!"

Once more he was silent. "Oh, I am so proud of you," she said, in accents keen with apprehension, "and your future is to me—"

He broke in then with such passion as she had never seen him exhibit.

"Oh, Katherine, my love, I am so proud of you. You are my spiritual ideal in human form. On this earth I can be satisfied with you alone. All I ask is for our lives to be united, for us never to be separated, for us to be happy in our mutual love and our mutual ideals, for our combined forces in our work."

"Ah, do not believe I was so selfish as to think only of myself. It was for you, for you."

"I have all I want in you. You satisfy every desire that my heart, soul and mind can conceive. You are my inspiration—"

"I! Oh, what a disappointment my words must have been to you—you who are so much better than I that—"

"Hush!"

After awhile he said: "You are quite sure now?"

Looking straight into his eyes, she said: "Forgive me that first weakness. Now I see clearly. You are right, and I will stand by you and hold up your hands, and even if both of us should in the future come to rough places in consequence, we will but cling the closer knowing that at least we have followed the right path. All the struggle is over now, and you shall never see me falter again."

Something like a sob was her first answer. Then he said: "Thank God!" and he took her in his arms.

Chapter II.

Before his congregation had listened to the final words of their young pastor's sermon the next morning, the most indifferent of his auditors was compelled to feel that he had had a fresh spiritual baptism, for his utterances were tinged with such zealous fire as might have fallen from the apostles' lips in earlier days.

"I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me," was his theme, and in every word he spoke there breathed the unmistakable devotion that could come only from one who had been sanctified as by fire. As he stood before his people, whom he loved despite their shortcomings, his face, pale with the sleepless vigil of the night, was lighted by an inner illumination, as an alabaster lamp in a temple might glow with the sacred fire, and his blue eyes turned their searching and dauntless gaze down on his auditors. Only when those eyes rested for an instant on one pew in the centre of the church, where a young girl sat, did something like pathos darken the iris, like a trembling shadow on the sunny bosom of a pool, but the firm, resonant voice never faltered as he outlined in uncompromising terms the doctrine of self-denial in following the Master. When the last word had been spoken, the usual rustle that fluttered through the congregation was absent, and in the unbroken silence that followed the reading of the last hymn, the pastor announced that he had something to say, after the benediction, and that he would like all church members and officers to remain.

Every man looked wonderingly at his neighbor, and no one moved to depart. Without an instant's delay, the young pastor came out from behind the pulpit and stood on the topmost step of the platform.

"Dearly beloved brethren," he said

"DOWN THE CENTRE AISLE CAME DR. BRANNON, WITH HIS FIRM, FAMILIAR STRIDE."

Nay—somehow he himself must be to blame. He shifted his position once more in the big reclining chair, and the tenor of his thoughts shunted onto another track. Why did Dr. Brannon come to church so regularly of late? The doctor was reputed to be wealthy—how wealthy, no one knew—but perhaps if he appealed to him he might present the mortgage to the church. He curled his lip ere the thought was fairly formed. They did not deserve it, these worldly wise latter-day Christians.

Reasoning thus, he was just on the verge of recurring to the debt again, when there suddenly flashed through his head the words: "Through Christ who strengtheneth me." Like a flash his irritable and uncertain mood fell from him. He slipped from the chair to his knees, and when he rose again the old look of serenity had returned. Then, as he drew a long breath, his eyes rested upon the photograph of a girl, whose tender, fawn-like eyes and mobile mouth told of sensitiveness and affection, while purity of character dwelt in every feature of the clear-cut face, as delicate as a cameo. A pang shot through his heart as the reflection came to him that even in the first joy of their betrothal the duty of self-denial must confront them.

The flesh and the spirit contended, and human nature rebelled, yet duty triumphed, and it was with a sad joy he felt that he very threshold of this dream, a stern voice cried out of the silence, saying: "Deny! Deny! Take up thy cross!" Every feminine instinct rose in revolt. It was so hard. Why should their lives be robbed at the very steps of the altar! With every muscle tense she sat silent.

Outside of the window, the birds fluttering in the trees were twittering their loves as they settled for the night. Their soft chirpings smote upon her ear with painful vibrations. He leaned forward in the dusk.

"Katherine!" he said beseechingly—"Katherine!"

"Ah," she cried, and her voice went to his very heart. "I cannot think it is your duty. Not, not at first at least. Wait till another year. Your salary is too small for you to offer to them the little increase they have granted you, and all because you think—you imagine—it is your duty to accomplish the raising of this debt. Do you not see it is too much for you to undertake?"

It was his turn to be silent.

"Think—think," she continued rapidly, "of all that it will mean to us—a skipping life, petty economies, little soul-harrowing mortifications, a ceaseless round of vigilant economies, a curtailing of modest recreations, while we will be compelled to smile and assume a cheerful guise when with a touching accent, "what I have to say to you now I will say briefly, and then leave the issue in your hands, but, whatever the result may be, rest assured that I am impelled to it by a sense of duty and that my conscience will not permit me to keep silence. I am firmly convinced that the small but harassing debt you have carried for so many years is a clog upon your spiritual activities of which you little dream, and after more than a year's labor among you I am persuaded, by careful observation, that it is your imperative duty to lift this weight at once. I am aware that there are those in charge of the financial affairs of the church who have the well-being of all at heart, yet it is my belief that long familiarity with this debt has reduced its value to a purely commercial view-point in your eyes, and I wish to point out to you that there is an essentially Christian aspect to it. It is not right, either as individuals or as a corporation, to owe money which we can pay. We are bound to discharge all such obligations whenever possible; when we do not, our moral sense is by so much stultified and we lower our standard of life. The fact cannot be disguised that this church as a whole is perfectly able to pay this debt in full, nor is there any among you who is so poor in this world's goods that he cannot pay his share, however small. If it involves some self-denial so much the better. Can we not do all things through Christ who strengtheneth us? I am pained to find that within the past year the church has had but five additions on profession of faith, while we lost by death and removals fourteen. There is something wrong with such a state of affairs, and I am firmly convinced that we must remove all stumbling blocks before we can hope for better things. Since it is my ardent wish not only to advise you of your duty, but to do my own as well, I make the offer of donating the $100, which you have kindly voted as the increase to my salary for the ensuing year toward the lifting of this debt, provided that you pledge yourselves to raise the rest of the amount within the year. Finally—"there was a long pause, and when he finished the sentence his voice had changed—"finally, brethren, if you do not see fit to act on this suggestion, I shall at once place my resignation in your hands, to be acted on at your pleasure."

He sat down abruptly and covered his face with his hands.

Then, far down in the right hand aisle, near the pulpit, there stood up the tall, unbending figure of Elder Taylor, and he spoke in a dry, rasping voice, the voice of a man devoid of imagination and scant of generosity, and he said, "I am sure we all give brother Perry credit for meaning well, and so far as I'm concerned I'm not offended by his plain speaking; but this is purely a business matter, to be settled at the regular meetings and not to be discussed off-hand in this unusual way. As for us falling off in the Christian life, I think that's a mistake, for we sent over $200 to foreign missions last year, and we've just voted an increase of $100 in brother Perry's salary, and we've paid the interest on the mortgage right along. As to his resigning, I'm sure I speak for all the brethren when I say that so long as we're satisfied he needn't think of that. But brother Perry shows the right spirit in offering to help us with that debt, and I'm glad to see him such a willing servant in the Lord's vineyard. Now, the quarterly interest is just due, and if we pay it out of that $100 and apply the rest to the principal, it'll help us considerable and maybe next year—"

"Wait—wait a minute," cried a loud voice in the rear of the church. Men and women turned excitedly in their seats. Down the centre aisle came Dr. Brannon, with his firm, familiar stride, his long, white hair falling over his collar, his head thrown back, his leonine figure alert with the spirit of a virile old age. The thunderstruck audience gazed at him fascinated, as with uplifted hand he faced them and lifted up his resonant voice.

"Will you not listen to me for a moment? You know me; you have known me for many years. I am not one of your flock, and I do not claim the right to be heard, but I ask it as a privilege this once, or forty years I have lived among you, have entered your households, have been with you in sickness and in health, in life and in death. I have helped your children and your children's children into the world. I have saved the lives of some of you, and when my poor science has failed me at other times I have spent many silent hours of grief.

"My beloved wife believed in your faith, and for her sake I studied it through her eyes. She was borne to her last resting-place from this altar, and many of you grieved with me in that terrible hour. It is by virtue of such associations as these that I ask you to hear me. It is not necessary for me to tell you that I do not need the money represented by the mortgage which I hold, and you know me too well to doubt my sincerity, when I say that I feel it to be an utter impossibility to accept the offer so generously made by your pastor, simply because for me it would be nothing short of robbery, and I should feel it to be a cowardly act.

"Now, my friends, that is the expression of my own personal feeling in the matter, but there is yet another side to it. Your pastor has eloquently and truly put before you your Christian duty, and to such a zealous presentation of the moral aspect there is nothing I can say which would add any weight. But let me state the plain business facts to you.

"As a purely commercial proposition it is to your advantage to take your pastor's advice. For the last five years before this mortgage fell into my hands, it was held by a man who charged you eight per cent. interest. I have charged but six, but in the fifteen years in which you have carried the debt, the interest has amounted to exactly $1,000, the principal itself. Mr. Perry has told you the truth; you are able to pay it, and without accepting his self-denying offer. I, too, believe that it is for your good to do this. Will you accept this $100 offered by your pastor? You are now paying him a salary of $700, with the additional $100 it would be $800, and $800 is $15.38 per week for living expenses.

"Surely you have not thought of these things; surely you will not accept it and stint him; surely you will not refuse it, and let him go from among you sick at heart! You are in a dilemma, and you can do neither of these things without doing both him and yourselves an injustice.

"Therefore, in place of Mr. Perry's generous offer, I myself offer to remit the quarterly interest now due and $100 of the principal toward the payment of this debt, provided that the rest be raised within ninety days. I will also subscribe $100 to your general fund for the ensuing year."

He scribbled rapidly on a leaf torn from his prescription pad, and passed the slip to the stupefied elder, who stood as though transfixed. "Here, Mr. Taylor, will you kindly write your subscription directly under mine, and then go down the centre aisle. Who'll go down the other aisles?"

Half a dozen men sprang up, crying, "I! I! I!" The tide had turned. Men rushed up to Dr. Brannon and shook him by the hand; women wept silently as they hastily scribbled their modest amounts on the slips of paper: boys and girls signed their names to sums that represented their small savings or their allowance, and close-fisted men laboriously scrawled the price of a load of hay or corn.

It was not fifteen minutes before the debt was wiped out, with a balance of $42.15 to spare, and as Dr. Brannon read the result from the pulpit steps something like a cheer arose, and with one impulse every one in the house pressed forward to grasp their pastor's hand.

He was overwhelmed, as the doctor passed every word of thanks on to him, saying: "I did it for him."

Katherine Travis came forward, aglow and brilliant as a rose, and neither she nor the young pastor cared that the ardor of their greeting betrayed their secret.

Hours afterward, Dr. Brannon left the pastor's study, after a long and heartfelt conversation.

"Tell me," said the young minister, holding the physician's hand closely, "why did you do it?"

The elder man hesitated an instant.

"You have the same look in your eyes that my wife had," he said.

AWAY TO MONT-LAWN

AWAY from the homes of want and care

The pale-faced children go,

Away to the land of promise rare

Where the milk and honey flow.

Away from the slums with their filth and sin,

From the sights and the sounds of woe,

Away to the Home that gathers them in

Where the daisies and buttercups grow.

Away from the oath and the withering blight,

From the odors vile of the street,

Away where they wander from morn till night

In the air that's so pure and sweet.

Away from the school of vice and crime,

From the shameful sights in view,

Away where they gaze on nature sublime

And learn of the pure and the true.

Away to Mont-Lawn! away to Mont-Lawn!

Where the sparkling waters flow,

Where from morn till night, 'tis a round of

The children are pleading to go. [delight:]

COMMUNION AND TRANSFORMATION*

Character Changed by Association with Christ

WHO has not been conscious of a temporary, perhaps only a momentary, change, akin, at an infinite distance, to that scene on the mount of transfiguration? The light of the candle is the same in essence as the light of the sun; and so the light in the soul of man, if God has kindled it, differs from that which shone in Christ, in degree, not in nature. There are times when prayer seems to make a new creature of the praying man. He draws so near to God, is so consciously in the divine presence, that it does not seem possible that he can ever sin again. All that is mean and wicked and degrading seems to fall away from him, and he longs only that his present mood may abide. Like Peter, he says, "It is good to be here." But at the foot of the mount, there is a duty waiting to be done, and after the vision of the heavenly, there is contact with people so wicked that, like the child waiting for Christ's coming, they seem possessed by an unclean spirit. Happy the man, who not only has seasons of blissful communion, but brings from the Presence, power by which others may be cleansed and purified.

The law of transformation of character is a mystery. We cannot tell how it operates, but it is an indubitable fact. One of the most corrupt libertines of modern times has told the world how the company of a pure, noble-minded girl affected him temporarily. In her presence his speech changed, so that the words he habitually used, would have scorched his lips, and his very thoughts were cleansed. True, he hurried away to more congenial company, but so long as he was in that girl's presence, a foul thought seemed almost blasphemous. There have been instances of a friendship working a permanent change of character. There was a clergyman in New York some years ago, who had a number of poor, wretched slaves of drink, whom he called his friends. These men were told that whenever they felt the craving for intoxicants growing irresistible, they might come to him. He would not argue with them, or plead with them; but would show them pictures, or take them out in the country, or in some other way direct their thoughts into higher channels, devoting himself to them until the temptation had subsided. His very presence, even his silent companionship, seemed to be a source of strength. The influence of such a friend is a potent force.

This law of transformation is the basis of Christianity. Men cannot change themselves. Good resolutions, stringent rules of life, assiduous attendance at church, earnest striving after a higher life—all these fail, praiseworthy as they are. The one and only force that transforms character is association with Christ. To dwell on his character, to study his words, to do his will, to live consciously in his presence, to talk with him and to make him the model of life, that is to place oneself in the line of blessing. To a man who will do that honestly and sincerely, Christ comes very near. From his superabundant spirituality there comes a power that imperceptibly changes human nature. No one ever earnestly sought his friendship in vain. He gives it freely, and for the very purpose for which it is sought. He came to give life and to give it more abundantly. As a man who seeks the love of a human being, strives to be worthy of it, is careful to do nothing that would grieve the other, or alienate his love, so the desire for Christ's love begets purity and unselfishness, and the consciousness of being loved by Christ fills the heart with joy and peace and the graces of the spirit. So humanity is changed into the same image. We know not what we shall be, but we know that when he appears we shall be like him.

A Good Shepherd

Here, on the lonely prairies of the great Northwest, we appreciate beautiful papers, books and pictures; and I can't tell you how much pleasure your Art Portfolio has given. My brother, who has been wintering 4,500 sheep on his ranch, was so pleased with "Home from the Hills," which shows a shepherd bringing his flocks home, that I gave it to him.

I know a true story of a good shepherd, whom I think your readers would like to hear about; it makes us think of the comparison drawn by our Lord. On a cold day, several months ago, a herder in an adjoining county was out with a large flock of sheep. As the afternoon wore away it grew very cold, and a storm of wind and snow came on. The herder was expecting aid from the ranch, as always on rough days one or more men go out to help drive the sheep into the great corrals, where they are safe from wolves and coyotes; but the owners neglected to go or send, until the storm had so increased that in the fast-coming darkness the herder could not be found. It was useless, he knew, to try to take so many in without help; and he dared not leave them alone to drift with the storm and be lost. So all that long, terrible night, when the government thermometer registered thirty-five degrees below zero, he stayed with his flock, and with the help of his good little dog kept the whole herd from drifting, and not one of his sheep was lost!

ROOF-GARDENS FOR THE POOR

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

THE provision of roof-gardens for the rest, recreation and refreshment of the poor, is becoming more and more a popular phase of benevolence in New York City, where we have, as nowhere else on our continent, the problem of a congested population and insufficient ground surface. Hospitals, social settlements, and other philanthropic institutions are making those in need of such hospitality welcome to their housetops. Awnings, hedges of potted plants, music, refreshment-stands, checker-boards, ping-pong sets, swings, sand-piles and other devices for the comfort and entertainment of adults and children add attractions to these breathing-places near the sky.

A night scene on the Industrial Alliance Building, which is in one of the city's most crowded districts, is reproduced on our first page. Morning and afternoon, the crowd collecting here is composed chiefly of children; in the evening, the elevator carries up the old, middle-aged and young; whole families come, bringing lunch as to a picnic. Nice milk can be had at the booth (one of those established by Nathan Strauss), for a cent a glass; so, unless one is very poor indeed, he need not hunger or thirst.

Not far from the Alliance, on the Hebrew Technical School for Girls, is what some one has described as the "gem-mest little roof-garden in town," so many flowers and plants beautify it. Up here, classes recite, and girls take sewing lessons. The University Settlement roof garden is famous for the games of ball the neighborhood lads play up there, for ping pong, for music rendered by its own clubs, and for other interesting things. On both the Alliance and the University, and on the Friendly Aid Settlement, 248 East 34th street, the city conducts kindergartens in the morning. The tops of many of our public school buildings serve as playgrounds.

The opening of public school roof-gardens to children in the evening is an innovation of this summer. No other city in the world, so far as the writer can learn, has introduced this feature into its educational system; and in this, as in the creation of recreation piers, New York is again an originator and pioneer. The first was opened July 28; there are now six in operation in Manhattan and Brooklyn, from 7.30 to 9.30 every evening. "Over 8,000 children were on the city's roof-gardens last night," Dr. William H. Maxwell, Superintendent of Schools, telephoned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the morning after the fourth was inaugurated. An orchestra or band plays every night for the little folks; sometimes a sweet-voiced girl or boy sings a solo; and the children disport themselves in their usual games. Recently, they invented a new one; it was "Ring-around-the Mayor." Mayor Low, who is a great friend to children and child education, went to see how the small people were enjoying themselves; he shook hands with every youngster circling around him, while mothers looked on in open-eyed wonder and delight. It is largely due to the Mayor's good offices that the appropriation of $25,000 for evening playgrounds was secured. The concert with which the first of the series was opened was attended by 3,000 children, who cheered Dr. Maxwell to the echo for his thoughtfulness of the little people's pleasure. The 3,000 sang in chorus, and pedestrians on the streets paused and looked up in wonder. Miss Evangeline E. Whitney, Superintendent of Vacation Schools and Playgrounds, and the various supervisors are very busy people, and exceedingly popular with small people in the East Side, who are always grateful to those who help them to get a breath of fresh air and a chance to play and sing.

HIT A SOLDIER.

The Experience of One of Our Men.

The soldier boys who fought during the Rebellion went home as a rule in pretty bad shape, caused by exposure and improper food and the use of quantities of coffee which left its mark in the wreck of many a stomach. Merrill Hutchinson of Reading, Mass., tells his experience.

"I am an old soldier who served all through the war of the Rebellion and my coffee drinking commenced when I enlisted. I drank it three times a day and at the close of the war returned home almost a wreck.

For years I had dyspepsia of the worst kind and could not drink anything but warm water or warm milk, nor eat enough to hardly keep a man alive. After suffering this way for years, and half living, I was told by a friend of your Postum Coffee.

At first I refused to even try it for I thought it meant more suffering for me, but at last consented and it did taste mighty good, for I was a dear lover of coffee.

I waited for the distress in my stomach that always had come with common coffee, but never came. I drank it at first very carefully and then got reckless and wanted it ever meal and for over five years now have been drinking nothing else. I have no dyspepsia now, no trouble about eating anything. My weight, when I began using Postum Cereal Food Coffee, was 125 pounds. I am now 6 years old and weigh about 160 pounds and am solid as a rock and able to do a day's work with any of the boys. Now I do not claim that Postum Cereal is a medicine, but in my own case it is both victuals and drink. I think that when Postum Coffee is properly made it is far ahead of coffee."

LESSON XVII

The Double-Length Principle

149. Curved consonants are made twice their usual length to indicate the addition of tr, dr, or thr; thus, flow, float, laugh, laughter, father, vain, vendor, thunder, oyster, shatter, mother, smoother, centre or sender, lighter, slighter, builder, boarder.

150. When dr or thr follow an initial l they are expressed by l and not by doubling the l; thus, older, leader, leather. After f, sh, m also, dr is expressed by l and not by doubling; thus, fodder, shudder, modder.

151. Straight consonants hooked finally, or which follow another stroke, are made twice their usual length to indicate the addition of tr or dr; thus, pain, painter, ten, tender, wren, render, won, wonder, yon, yonder, Hun, hunter, rafter, neck, nectar, rector, detractor, disputer, debater.

152. The character mp is doubled to express mpr or mbr; thus, temper, chamber. The character ng is doubled to express ngkr or nggr; thus, shinker, longer.

153. The hooked consonants mpr, mbr, ngkr, nggr, are generally more convenient for verbs, because they can be readily halved for the past tense; thus, scamper, scampered, cumber, cumbered, canker, cankered, linger, lingered.

154. In a few common words it is allowable to double a letter to express the addition of the syllable -ture; thus, feature, future, signature, picture.

155. When the present tense of a verb is written with the double-length principle, the past tense is written with the half-length principle; thus, ponder, pondered, tender, tendered, encounter, encountered, slander, slandered, hinder, hindered, pamper, pampered.

156. When a word ends with a vowel preceded by tr, dr, thr, or thr, these consonants must be written and not indicated by doubling; thus, flatter, flattery, winter, century, audier, audier, feather, feathery. The circle s at the end of a double-length character is read as usual; thus, tenders, feathers, counters.

Exercise 49

1. Enter, Easter, loiter, shutter, matter, mattered. 2. Founder, asunder, smatter, cylinder, Walter, mentor. 3. Palter, porter, folder, charter, chartered, herder. 4. Letter, louder; latter, ladder; fetter, feeder; evader. 5. Shouter, shedder; mutter, madder; fitter, federal. 6. Pointer, tinder, ranter, wander, wandered, haunter. 7. Elector, gunpowder, dissector, pretender, bookbinder. 8. Vamper, Humber, jumper, timber, belonger. 9. Slumber, slumbered; anger, angered; entered. 10. Flounder, floundered; director, directory; futures.

Exercise 50

1. Most of the typewriters at present in use had American inventors and originators, and the early promoters of these valuable aids to authors of letters and documents were of American nationality. 2. Many an inventor and thinker has added first one and then another new device to the older models. 3. These have included a tabulator for tabular matter, and a duplicator for producing many copies of the same writing. 4. The manipulator, who is known as a typist, uses a lubricator, in other words an oil can, to keep his machine in proper order. 5. To measure gas we use a meter; to learn the distance we travel, we refer to a pedometer or cyclometer. 6. A tube of quicksilver is an indicator of changes of weather.

REVIEW.

1. What additions are expressed when a curved consonant is written double its usual length? 2. Under what restrictions are the same additions expressed when a straight consonant is doubled? 3. What do and express when doubled? 4. For what class of words are and most convenient; explain why? 5. What syllable is added in a few common words when a consonant is doubled? 6. In the case of a verb written with the double-length principle, how is the past tense expressed? 7. Write territory, votary. 8. When a circle s is added to a double-length character how is it read?

At this stage of his study the student should read as much shorthand as possible, for practice in reading is second only in importance to practice in writing shorthand. It is in this respect that the student of the Isaac Pitman system has so great an advantage over writers of other systems, there being more shorthand literature in the Isaac Pitman system than will be found in all others combined. The introduction of well-written shorthand is to the brain of the thorough student, what the landscape is to the artist. For this purpose the student is recommended to purchase Esop's Fables, or Esop's Fables, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand. Either of these works will be sent postpaid on receipt of 25 cents, or the five for 10 cents. On less should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XVIII, will appear in the issue of Sept. 3.

ESKIMO HUNTER

THE LONELIEST MISSION IN THE WORLD

By Isabel Rogers Edgar

FOR over one hundred and thirty years, the Missionary Society of the Moravian Church (known as the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel), has maintained a mission among the benighted Eskimos of lonely Labrador. It has conveyed missionaries to the Coast of Labrador and maintained them while there, almost without other aid than the barter traffic with the Eskimos, which was always conducted on strictly Christian lines. The Society was founded in Bohemia in 1457; it commenced mission work in 1732.

On the Coast of Labrador, five stations were established by the Moravians, some fifty to one hundred miles apart, beginning at Hopedale, the most southern, and running up to Ramah, the furthest north, a distance of over six hundred miles. At each one of these settlements were stationed two or three missionaries and their wives.

For months at a time they are shut off from all communication with the outside world, and deprived of all save the barest necessities of life.

The very character of the coast of Labrador entails expense and multiplies difficulties. Buildings must be made comfortable and kept in good repair. All framework must be fitted out in Germany and sent over; only the foundations can be made in Labrador. Around the centre stone of church and missionary quarters, there are always a workshop and a store, the homes of the Eskimos, and, in the more southern stations, of a few white settlers. One peculiarly sad feature of the work lies in the inevitable parting with the children. When a child reaches its seventh year it is sent back to Germany to be educated and trained for the battle of life. The pitiful cry of a lonely mother, that a baby be sent her on which she might lavish her mother-love—she having parted from all of her own—gives an idea of one kind of sacrifice that is involved in a missionary's life there.

When a missionary wants a wife, he must write to the Home Board, and she is chosen for him by lot. To these lonely settlements comes, once a year, the good ship Harmony, bringing stores, gifts from people all over the world, and additional assistants to fill the places so often vacated by worn-out, exhausted laborers.

The missionaries allow no traffic in liquors. The Christian lives of these devoted workers, for over a century and a half, has smoothed the way of explanation for many a sermon, so difficult to make clear to a people in whose language there is no such word as "love," or expression of tenderness, in whose lives comes no seedtime or harvest in all the barren land; the few green things known, being the poor excuse for a garden around the mission quarters, when old tomato cans are carefully saved, and used as nightcaps for the tender plants, and even these are often blown away, and the plants uprooted long before maturity. There are no sheep, and the shepherd is not needed. All animals, in the eyes of the poor Eskimos, are created but to be killed; even the dogs, but one remove from the native wolf, are never shown a kindness; and yet to this people has been taught the Gospel of love, and forgiveness of sins, with such force and simplicity that along the eastern coast to-day, as far north as Cape Chudley, there is not left one heathen Eskimo. Heathen customs, such as polygamy and idolatry, are abandoned, ground instead of on the surface, and to be faithful to one wife. As they are converted and received into the church, Christian names taken from the Bible are given them, such as Peter, Nathaniel, David or Joseph, and until lately there have been no surnames. A woman named Deborah, would write her name Deborah Eduardeb, meaning "Deborah of Edward," and the husband would but reverse the names in order to define himself from any other Edward. Recently a desire expressed by some of the more enlightened converts for surnames was gratified, and they were allowed to choose. One desired the name of a favorite bird, and another of a certain plant, showing a certain bit of sentiment until then latent. At Hopedale and Nain, a love of music has been fostered to such a degree that orchestral music is in use for the church service. All church festivals are carefully observed.

Makkovik, the most southern of the stations, is also the most recent settlement and includes the families of white settlers as well as the Eskimos. But for the mission help, those people must in many instances have starved, small game having disappeared. Their whole livelihood came from the seal fisheries, and a bad season meant distress and poverty. Next in line comes Hopedale, where, for the last few years sickness (much of it due to influenza, carried to the coast each year by Newfoundland fishermen), has been fatal to many of the little group of workers. Hopedale is feeling also, more than any other station, the weakening effects of civilization.

After leaving Hopedale the coast grows more rugged, and the rocks fairly glisten with the beautiful blue and yellow sheen of the Labradorite, a felspar that will bear a hard polish with brilliant effects. Vegetation grows more sparse. A tree planted at Hebron thirty years ago, is only some twenty-eight inches high now. In 1895, a missionary festival or a "Missionemut" was held, the sum realized amounting to about fifteen dollars. Venison joints, deer, tongues, bead work, baskets and mats made of grass seal-skin gloves and slippers were all donated by the natives. One pair of gloves bore the name of "Bridgetib Joelib," (the work of Bridget the wife of Joel).

On Palm Sunday, at Okkak, ten persons were admitted to the Church on profession of their faith. One woman confessed to having carried on witchcraft. Ramah, a handful of native huts, together with the mission buildings, is the most northern station. From here, around Cape Chudley to Ungava Bay, few Eskimo are found. This little settlement on the coast, under the shadow of stupendous cliffs, suffers most from isolation, poverty, and the bitter cold of the long winter.

Taking in all the mission work along this eastern coast, there is a total list of names enrolled of about 4,000. This embraces nearly the whole of the sparse population. Of these, 600 or more are active communicants. Other Christian workers are coming to the field; but to the Moravians belongs the honor of being the first and most self-sacrificing missionaries in that region.

the Christian religion adopted, and, although still superstitious, the Eskimo has a loving reverence for Christ.

In no other place in the wide world over have mission labors been more richly rewarded. The Eskimos have been taught to bury their dead beneath the

SINFUL WORRYING

TEXT, Matt. 6: 34

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof"

CHRIST is giving counsel, which recalls the advice the dying man once gave to his children. After calling his sons and daughters to his bedside, the dying father said: "My children, I have seen a lot of troubles in my time. I have seen so many troubles that they have completely worn me out, and that is the reason that I am now dying, when I ought to be in my physical and mental prime. But the saddest part of it is, that most of my troubles have been imaginary troubles. They have been unnecessary troubles. They have not been troubles of the imminent to-day, but the visionary to-morrow. They have been troubles which would never have bothered me, unless I had gone forth and hunted them out of their lairs and troubled them. The things that have given me most concern, have been the things that never happened. So I charge you, my dear children, if you would serve God with your best physical, mental and spiritual powers, always obey the words which Christ spake in his famous sermon: 'Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'"

My glorious text teaches almost exactly the same lesson that Mr. Beecher once presented, when he said: "All time is divided into three parts: the past, the present and the future. The past belongs to gratitude and regret. The present to contentment and work. The future should belong to only hope and trust." It teaches that a dread of future evil is dishonoring to God, because it implies a doubt whether the good God will be true to the trust we have placed in him, and whether he will really keep the promises he has made to his people. It teaches that, after a Christian has done his best—his level and conscientious best—he should then joyfully and confidently leave the future in God's hands—and in God's hands alone. It teaches that no matter how hopeless, humanly speaking, may be the outlook, if we know and trust God, we should let our Gospel faith chase away all the doubts, and worries, and fears that fret, and tease, and tantalize us, in reference to the future, even as the rising sun scatters the darkness and the impenetrable gloom of the night. It teaches that no matter how dark and threatening may be the shrieking tornadoes of trouble, the Gospel rainbows should be big enough to arch the widest of horizons, and bright enough to smile through even a shower of falling tears.

No Immunity from Trouble

Anticipated troubles rarely happen. By this statement I do not mean that if a man would cease to worry he could get a divine passport which would protect him forever from the rough hand of trouble. The cup of sorrow must be pressed against every human lip. The old eyes, as well as the young eyes, must become fountains of tears. Death Angel, as well as Birth Angel, must flap the wing over a Pharaoh's palace, as well as over the poor man's hut. The village church bell, which can throb for joy in a wedding chime and swing its clapper to ring out a Christmas carol, is the same bell that can toll out a slow, melancholy dirge. The house of feasting must become the house of mourning. The orange blossoms and the cypress must grow side by side. It is by troubles that God trains his children to do the work for which they were intended. It is by the broken heart that he is able to make his songsters and songstresses sing their sweetest music.

But though troubles must and will come to the rich and the poor, the old and the young alike, yet I make this assertion about your past life: the troubles and misfortunes which you anticipated and worried over, rarely, if ever, happened. As our own philosopher-poet said:

Some of your ills you have cured
And the sharpest you still have survived;
But what torments of pain you've endured
From evils that never arrived!

In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the troubles which did you the most serious damage were those troubles which, as a tiger, leaped upon you unexpectedly from ambush, not the troubles that lay crouching and glaring and threatening you in broad daylight, in the open pathway just ahead. Those serious troubles came to you as the little pigmy was supposed to have come to the king of old. When the pigmy asked the great monarch for permission to rule over all the land which his little, short limbs could cover in three steps, the royal consent was derisively given. Then the insignificant dwarf immediately sprang up into the stature of a huge giant. With one stride, the giant stepped across the land; with another stride, the giant stepped across the seas, and with a third stride, the giant lifted his sledgehammer fist and swept the trembling king off his throne. Your troubles, to use a familiar comparison, came like a clap of thunder and a stroke of lightning out of a clear sky. They came like a collision at sea, or as the terrific explosion of a gunpowder magazine. They came as a thief, not by day, but by night, in a way and at a time you did not expect them.

Let me illustrate how your troubles came in an unexpected way. Two of your three children were born physically strong. Every movement of their limbs, every smile of their red lips, every look of their dancing eyes, bespoke perfect health. They could run up the mountain-side as swiftly as a gazelle chased by the dogs. They would climb a tree almost as quickly as a squirrel would seek his nest in the old orchard trunk. Then those children would sit laughing and singing, and swinging upon one of the branches. But though two of your children were born physically well, the third was born a poor, helpless invalid. You, about that third child from the day when she was born. For years, not a night passed in which you did not arise two or three times, to go to the crib and give the necessary medicines. Did your worrying about that child do you any good? Did your troubles come in the way you expected? To-day, your two children, who were once strong, are dead. Diphtheria in one week slew them both. Your invalid daughter, about whom you worried, has overcome her invalidism, and grown into young womanhood; she is now married and has children of her own. Your troubles came, but the panther leaped upon you from the rear, and did not lie crouching in the open pathway ahead.

The Mother, Worried

As a business man, you have often worried about this, that and the other thing. You have worried about whether the firm that failed would be able to pay for the goods they bought. You have worried about the tariff laws and the elections. You have worried about the rival concern which settled on the next block. You never thought that a worse trouble could come to you than the loss of your store. You never thought that your own health could break down, and that you would have to resign from the firm and sell out. Troubles came into your life, but they invariably came in the way and at the time you did not expect.

If this premise is true, is it not time for you to stop your useless fretting? Is it not a senseless occupation, to be worrying about certain troubles which in all probability—judged by the past—will never afflict your life? Do you not feel that the old English proverb is right which declares, "You must not cross the bridge until you come to it?" In the journey of life, you will find many bridges down. You will discover that the spring freshets have swept away the embankments upon which countless abutments were placed. But in all probability the bridge you worry most about will be firm enough and strong enough to bear you over its stream, although you may have to wade into other angry waters a little further on.

Sir Walter Scott's Labor

Anticipating troubles is a sin, because the present duties of life tax almost every man's physical and mental resources to the utmost limit. We read with sorrow and admiration about the pathetic struggle Sir Walter Scott made, in his old age, to pay off his debts. By a foolish investment he became responsible for something like $600,000. With his magic pen he went to work. He worked during the day. He worked during the night. He worked while he lay in bed. He worked when walking upon the street. He lived and worked for the one purpose—that of being able to say he owed no man a penny. But while he worked, he so worried over this debt, that one day his physician came to him and said, "Sir Walter, if you do not cease worrying you will die." With that, the magician of Abbotsford looked up and gave a wan smile, as he said, "Why, doctor, as long as that debt is hanging over my head, I cannot help worrying. I know the worrying is killing me. But you might as well go and tell my cook to order the water in the kettle not to boil, as to command my brain not to worry."

But Sir Walter Scott, toiling to pay off his debts by the use of his pen, did not have to work any harder than thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women have to work to meet the responsibilities of the present time. Take, for illustration, the ministers of our generation. Last week I received a message from a so-called gentleman, which politely informed me that "the preachers of our time, as a rule, lead an idle and an unoccupied existence, and that there is nothing for them to do." Nothing for the average preacher to do? Why, the average preacher to-day is working as hard as ever beast of burden worked under driver's lash. He is working so hard that, from Monday morning to Sunday night, he is mentally and physically on the strait all the time. I tell you that the preparation of two sermons, and the meeting of the many duties of the pastorate combine to make a herculean task—a task which gives but little time for the sleep and recreation that are necessary for physical wellbeing. But the average preacher has no more demands made upon him than the average doctor, lawyer, editor, merchant, clerk, wife or mother. Almost without exception, all people are working up to their physical and mental limit. Ye strange to say, though most people are working very hard, comparatively few break down from overwork. God gives to all of us strength enough to meet the duties of the present day. But God does not give to any one strength enough to meet the duties of the present day and those of to-morrow at the same time. So most people, when they break down, do not break down from overwork, but, like Sir Walter Scott, from worry and from worry alone.

Unnecessary Burdens

People who are unfitting themselves for the duties of everyday life by worry, remind me of an old story that is told about a traveler in the far East, who was trudging along a highway, under, what he regarded, as a grievously heavy load. Along that highway came king driving in his chariot. He reined in his horses and asked the tired pedestrian if he would not like to ride. The weary traveler gladly assented, and climbed into the rear of the chariot. After awhile the king looked back, and, to his surprise, saw the traveler sitting crouched in the rear of the chariot, with his heavy pack still strapped to his back. "Stranger," said the king, "why art thou still holding thy pack?" "Because," answered the man, "I did not feel that thou wouldst like it if I placed it in thy chariot. I thought if thou wert willing to carry me, I ought at least to be willing to hold my pack." "Oh, foolish man," answered the king, "if I am willing to carry thee, am I not willing to carry thy pack also?" So God promises that he will help us carry the duties of the present day. But instead of trusting him as to the future, most people pile upon their own backs all the cares and the anxieties of the morrow. They sit in the Divine King's chariot, like the tired traveler of old, weighed down with a pack of to-morrow's cares, which they ought to be willing to lay at their Master's feet.

As worry racks the physical frame, so that the tire mind is unable to think clearly; as it overtaxes the nervous system until the ganglia, or nerve centres, have imperfect connection, or complete disconnection, like the telephone, when the wires have become broken or crossed; as worry paralyses the digestive organs, until they refuse properly to assimilate the food upon which the human body is dependent for the sustenance of life as it is the forerunner of all the fatal diseases by which the human race is invalidated and destroyed, so it is a awful sin for you to fret and worry about the future and destroy your life's usefulness and influence. Can you not, as true Christian men and women, go forth to meet the duties of the present day, and leave the visionary future in God's hands? Worry is not a harmless gadfly, an insectile annoyance, a buzzing irritant, a happy hazard, playful habit. It is a sin which has destroyed more victims than have ever been slain upon the field of battle, or ground into pieces between the upper and the nether millstones of persecution and slander. Beware how you allow its fatal poison to enter your sinful heart.

Worrying Blinds the Eyes

Anticipating trouble is a form of intellectual and spiritual sin, by which some men are blinded to the appreciation or enjoyment of present blessings. Because of this sin, they cannot thank God for their loving wives and devoted children. They cannot thank God for the food they eat and the clothing they wear. They cannot thank him for their opportunities of usefulness and for health and life. They are always thinking of something they might have had; of something that might be taken away. They have no gratitude in their hearts to God for anything. Every kiss has in it, for them the sting of a scorpion. Every sunbeam is eclipsed by a dark cloud. Every song has in it the echo of a requiem, and a death rattle. Every moment is for them a pall-bearer, clothed in black, walking by the casket of a stenchful corpse.

Hogarth, the great caricaturist, once declared that he never saw a beautiful face without instantly thinking how he could distort it and make it look ridiculous. So people who are always worrying about the future are species of sinful, morbid caricaturists, rendering hideous and repulsive even the sweetest and the tenderest blessings of the present day. They are like some of those self-absorbed and absent-minded people you meet and speak to upon the street. You may bow to them, and talk to them, but they see not and hear not. They are in their imaginations a thousand miles away. Those people who are anticipating troubles can never pluck the flowers God has planted at their feet. They can never hear the birds, whose wings God has fashioned, flinging over their heads. They can never look into the unfathomed sea of affection which God has rolled into the deep blue of a child's eye, because they are always living in the dark caverns, the reptile-inhabited dungeons which their own evil imaginations have created.

A List of Blessings

In order to overcome this sin of worrying, I want you to try an experiment: Every hour of every day try to think of the blessings God has given to you, instead of trying to remember all your troubles. If you have a poor memory, I want you to take a long sheet of paper and write those blessings down, as you think of them, and then every little while take up this paper and read over the list. You will need a very long sheet of paper, when you once begin the list. You are going to be surprised, overwhelmingly surprised, at the great number of blessings you can put down. I well remember, many years ago, when my father once gathered all his children together about his chair, and gave to each one of us a long sheet of paper, and told us to write down our blessings. At first, I could not think of a thing to write. But after awhile, the blessings, the many blessings which I had, began to crowd into my brain. I wrote and wrote, until, after awhile, I had to get another sheet of paper. Then I wrote and wrote, until after awhile those blessings seemed to pile themselves up into a great mountain. And then, do you know, after I had been cataloguing my many blessings, I was ashamed to think about any of my troubles! They seemed to be so small and insignificant, in comparison with the mercies with which God had surrounded me. My brother, as you begin to-day to think of all your blessings, I tell you bluntly and plainly it is a shame, a sinful shame, for you to have postponed so long learning the prayer of thanksgiving. It is a shame, a sinful shame, that you have postponed so long the day when you are willing to get down upon your knees and thank God for what he has done for you, and for the blessings that have enriched your life.

There are many different hymns sung in church, in prayer-meeting and at the family altar, but there is no hymn that breathes in it a sweeter Gospel, no hymn which helps more to make a truer, happier, purer and holier Christian life than that hymn with the chorus:

Count your blessings, name them one by one,
Count your blessings, see what God has done.

This is a hymn that ought to be sung every day, from the heart. It is a hymn which should aid in transforming a life of sinful worrying into one of trust and gratitude and holy joy.

Troubles cannot be rightly anticipated, because we cannot rightly anticipate the grace God will give to his believing children, by means of which we shall be able to overcome our troubles when they arrive. For proof of the abundant grace and strength that are given when most needed, let me point you to the many wonderful, glorious and triumphant Christian death-bed scenes that have been recorded. When Doctor Donne was dying, he said, in answer to a question: "I am as happy on earth as I can be, and as sure of glory as if I were in it. I have nothing to do but step out of this bed into heaven." When Senator Foote of Vermont was dying, he looked, at the last, and cried: "I see it! I see it! The gates are wide open, Beautiful! Beautiful!" As Dr. Sewall, of Washington City, lay dying, he cried out: "Oh, if I had a voice that would reach from pole to pole, I would proclaim it to all the world! Victory! Victory, through the Blood of the Lamb!" But when we hear of such wonderful death-bed scenes, we are apt to say to ourselves, "I do not see how any Christian could be happy when he is leaving behind wife, children, work, and loved ones. I do not see how anybody could be happy because he is going away, while those who are near and dear to him are clinging to his side."

But, friend, the reason you cannot understand the glorious triumph of the dying Christian, is because you cannot understand the infinite amount of Divine re-enforcement which is given to God's children at the time the Death Angel comes. You cannot understand how that Divine re-enforcement is able to let them look straight through the dark clouds of mystery, into the face of Jesus, whose parting lips tell them that all is well. When your future troubles come, and they must come, God's grace, if you are a believing child, will be sufficient for you. God's grace, the infinite amount of which you cannot now estimate, will go with you down into the depths of sorrow, "though the waters thereof roar and be troubled; though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." When trouble comes to God's children, he will give to them the spiritual re-enforcement which came to Mrs. Palmer, the hymnologist, when her two eyes were becoming sightless. Her daughter, Mrs. Joseph F. Knapp, told me of this incident. One day, Mrs. Palmer was very much in prayer. Mrs. Knapp said that she felt her mother was praying to God to restore her eyesight. In the evening hour, the mother called to her and said, "Daughter, I wish you would light the gas." After a little, she said, "Have you lighted all the burners, Phoebe?" "Yes, mother," answered Mrs. Knapp. "Then," said Mrs. Palmer, "put the lights out daughter! put the lights out. I cannot see, but

God Knows Best!

Put the lights out! He knows best, though I cannot see." So when the future troubles come to God's children, they may not always be able to understand, but grace is given to them to know and to feel that God knows best, that God always knows best, and even though they may be physically blind they walk with confidence in the darkness trusting in his guiding hand.

Anticipating trouble is a sin, because it exhibits a lack of Gospel faith to the unbelievers around you, who might otherwise be willing to believe in the atoning, saving, inspiring and recreating power of the Blood of the Lamb. Talk as we may, we cannot get away from the overwhelming fact that every professing Christian is as a city set upon a hill for all unbelievers to look at, and to be guided by. It has been said that no cook or chambermaid, or butler, or other employee, ever entered the house of Phillips Brooks but he or she became a Christian, if not already one, through the influence of that great and good Gospel minister of Boston. So our Christian lights cannot be hidden under a bushel. If they are false lights, the world will see that they are false, and will despise them. If they are true lights, the world will follow those lights. What we say and do will influence others in reference to what they say and do, for or against Christ. If, by a true, simple faith, we can trust Christ in reference to the future, both temporally and eternally, then others will say, "That religion which makes him so happy is good enough for me. I will trust Christ also, because that man has an inspiring faith which I lack." But if, by worrying and fretting about the future, we show that we do not trust Christ, then others will say, "His faith does not stand the test. That professing Christian is no better off than I am. I shall not try to seek a Christ whom that man cannot trust."

In Touch With Christ

But no man can safely let the future take care of itself, unless he deals rightly with the present. And no man can deal rightly with the present, unless he deals rightly with God, or rather lets God deal rightly with him. Are you and I in touch with Jesus Christ, so that Christ can and will take charge of our future for us? If we are, we are eternally all right. If we are not in touch with Christ, we are eternally all wrong. If you are in touch with the Lord Jesus, and your present relationship with the Saviour is that of a true follower and disciple, then I would like to give to you the message which Abraham Lincoln sent to Richard Oglesby, in the darkest days of the Civil War. Richard Oglesby, who was thrice elected Governor of Illinois, was at one time very much discouraged. When the Union armies were being steadily driven back, he sent a melancholy letter to the White House, in which he told the President that he thought all was lost. When the letter came, Abraham Lincoln sent this startling telegram to the State Capitol at Springfield:

"DEAR DICK:—Read Exodus 14: 13: 'Fear ye not: stand still and see the salvation of the Lord.'"

"ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

Of all the passages of the Bible, that verse is to me the most inspiring. It is the verse which I repeat almost every day of my life. And, my brother, if your present moment, your momentous now, is right with Jesus Christ, I tell you to stand. Stand in the faith of Jesus. Stand as Abraham Lincoln told Richard Oglesby to stand. But, my brother, if your present relationship with Christ is not all right, then I beg of you not to stand still until you can press against the loving heart of the forgiving Saviour. Will you draw close to Christ's bleeding, wounded side? Will you, as a little child, encouraged by Christ's love and the strength he gives you, look up into the face of your Heavenly Father, and say, "Thy will, Oh, Lord, and not mine, be done?" Will you believe him? Will you trust him? Will you commit your present, and therefore your tomorrow, into his care?

Leave the future: let it rest
Simply on thy Saviour's will;
Leave the future; they are blest
Who confiding, hoping, still Trust His mercy
To provide for every want,
And to save from every ill.

WOODLAND RAMBLINGS AT MONT-LAWN

LITTLE ERIC

A RAMBLE through the woods to the Hook is one of Mont-Lawn's special pleasures for little folks. Here is the story of such a journey, as related by one of two teachers who conducted a party of thirty boys to the top of the mountain a few days ago:

"We start as soon as the dew is off the grass, taking a light lunch with us. The children want to gather flowers by the roadside. When they come to the spring, all stop and drink. No one hesitates to pick berries found on the way. If a carriage passes, the children cry: 'One side, one side!' and make room, sometimes cheering the occupants. The latter often question the teachers, and always express hearty good will and ishes for the children. At Craggy Heights, the children file, one by one, into a narrow foot-path branching off from the road, and the steepest part of the ascent begins. Wild thyme grows all along the path, and gives out pleasant odors as little garments brush by. Adventurous lads leave the beaten track for the pen woods, to gather things that attract them. One comes back with a stick of dead birchwood, covered with fungus, whose rich, red color has caught his eye.

one kneels over a huckleberry bush. If a shower of dew-drops, shaken from a low brush, mildly drenches the party, no one minds. Cat-birds and wood-robins are singing in the trees. Squirrels peep from leafy ambush at intruding visitors. The children rejoice over slim, scarlet lizards, and clumsy, high-backed turtles, katydids, 'walking-sticks,' great, brown wood-beetles, and gorgeous spiders.

When the top of the Hook is reached, the party never fails to stop and gaze in delight at the outspread valley. From one point a fine view is had of seven towns up and down the Hudson—Nyack, S. Nyack, Scarborough, Grand View, Ossining, Tarrytown, Irvington. A curious, indigenous cactus—the only variety found in the State—grows on the Hook. It bears a fine, large, yellow blossom. The children, in their eagerness to examine it, do not mind getting stung a little with tiny cactus thorns. Beginning the descent on the northern side of the Hook, a most lovely inland view unrolls—a charming group of lakes, several little villages, spreading farms, and broad meadows dotted with browsing cattle. Descent is very difficult, as the little path is continually losing itself, and there is a rocky way to tread. The reason for returning on the northern side is that two interesting sights are to be had there. So far down that the children can hardly distinguish their shapes or catch their sound, are the stone-crushers at work on the shore. The Hungarians employed in the quarry live high up on the ridge; and their queer little huts are objects of curious attention to our small adventurers. Rough walls of stone, or trees bent together for framework; sodded roofs on which grow weeds and brambles; low, rude doors hung on leather hinges, combine to impart to this odd little foreign village a most primitive aspect. Some huts are deserted, and childish eyes peeping in discover wide fireplaces without a chimney.

All the way, the children chatter incessantly over everything they see. One little boy says: 'I'm going to make a Hungarian hut soon as I get home.' And that afternoon, teachers came upon a wonderful structure of sticks, stones and mud near the Lodge, that is recognized promptly by these appreciative observers as a fair copy in miniature of a 'Hungarian hut.'

A number in this party never had a woodland walk before. Life for them has been bounded by the walls of a gloomy tenement court; the paved street has been their only playground; grass and flowers have been sealed mysteries to them; and clean, pure air to breathe, an unknown luxury. The teachers conducting our little explorers do not fail to lead their thoughts from nature to nature's God; nor to impart lessons of mercy to dumb creatures and of kindness to one another.

One of our boys returning to the city, had three big bunches of flowers to carry. "One for my mother," he told his teacher, "one for my father, and one for my sister. Teacher, I've learned lots of hymns to sing at home. And my mother'll be glad. But, O teacher! best of all: I've got a white heart!" He had been comforted by hearing that Jesus could cleanse his little heart of all dark, unkind, cruel thoughts, and make and keep it white. Eric, the little Norwegian boy in our picture, learned his first English words at Mont-Lawn; they were "Jesus loves even me." Even over the pretty white beds in the dormitories, tablets inscribed with the name of the friend contributing $21 for its support during the season, bear, in many cases, a reminder in the shape of a Bible text, that Jesus wants the little ones to come to him. Nothing pleases Dr. Klopsch more in the work of the Home than that it is bringing the little children of the slums to the Master.

Will you help us bring the little ones to Jesus? To send a waif of the streets for ten long blessed days to Mont-Lawn costs only $3; $6 sends two; $9, three; $12, four; $15, five; $36, twelve, and so on. All cash contributions should be sent to this office; gifts of garments, and they are most welcome, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, at Nyack, N. Y.

Civil War in the Black Republic

AFTER NEARLY A CENTURY OF INDEPENDENCE, HAITI IS NOW THE SCENE OF A SANGUINARY REBELLION

THESE comes from Haiti the news that the blockade of Cape Haitien, by the so-called revolutionist party, has been abandoned. The only vessel employed in the blockade was the gunboat Crete a Pierrot, the flagship of Admiral Killick, who is supporting Antenor Firmin in his struggle for the Presidency of the insular Republic. This struggle, in which Firmin is the conspicuous figure, is a part of a general scrimmage for office.

Eighteen months hence, on January 1, 1904, Haiti, the "Black Republic," will complete the first century of its existence. Another nation would exert itself to unite its forces and resources to celebrate such an anniversary. But Haiti is helplessly divided by the claims of more or less reputable pretenders to the Presidential chair, and their supporters, who are struggling not for political principle, but solely with the hope of gaining some lucrative position in the Government to be.

Gonaives, the very town where Haiti's independence was proclaimed in 1804, is to-day, a hundred years later, the seat of a rebellion. The grandson of the great Toussaint L'Ouverture, who more than anyone else prepared for the independence of Haiti, and the only surviving relative of the greatest black General, Jean Jumeau, is contributing more than anyone else to destroy the work of his forefather. Of the splendid patrimony left to the Haitians by Dessalines and the other Liberators, consisting of the undivided Island of Haiti and Santo Domingo, but one third is retained at the end of the first century of independence, and even this remnant is divided between two provisional governments, struggling with fire and sword for supremacy.

The present situation has been created by the following events. After the death of President Hypolite, under whose misgovernment the country was brought to the brink of ruin, General Simon Sam was elected President. His term, by the decree of the National Assembly, expired on May 15, 1903. In the latter year of his power, Simon Sam surrounded himself with a Cabinet composed of men who ruled as justly as it is possible to rule in Hayti. Their actions were marked by a dignity heretofore unknown, and chaos was followed by well-defined order in each branch of the Governmental service. The opponents of his administration, however, began to conspire, with a view of bringing General Sam's term to a close, prior to its legal expiration, and found ground for an attack in the constitution of the country, which fixes the Presidential term for six years.

Hypolite entered office in 1896, and died in 1897, and the enemies of General Sam maintained, that, as Hypolite's successor, he should merely round out his term, which terminated in 1902. To prevent civil war, Simon Sam declared in May of the current year, that he considered his term as closed, and voluntarily resigned, believing that in taking this step the peace of the country would be preserved. In this, however, he was mistaken, for the news of his resignation was the signal for an outburst of unbridled political passions. It had been General Sam's intention to remain in the presidential palace until his successor should be elected, but the populace, worked into fury by an unfounded rumor, that the National Assembly was in the pay of a German Syndicate to further the interest of General C. Lecomte, forcibly dissolved Parliament, and in the face of this acute danger, General Sam and his ministers left the country. C. Fouchard, who was Secretary of the Treasury under Solomon Hypolite, and the early part

Port-au-Prince with safety, prevailed upon the Commander of the northern district, General Nord, to march with an army of 3,000-4,000 men upon the capital, and not till Firmin had received proof of the good faith of the Provisional Government and the people did the northern army withdraw. The Provisional Government having ordered the general elections throughout the country, a speedy and peaceful solution of the situation seemed near at hand. Boisraud Canal had arranged that each candidate and his faction should be represented in the Provisional Government: thus the Provisional Secretary of War, General Alexis Nord, represented Firmin while General St. Fort Colin represented Seneque Pierre.

St. Fort Colin, the Provisional Secretary of the Interior, it is said, works on his own candidacy. General Nord, ostensibly in behalf of the Provisional Government, went to Cape Haitien, to see that the elections took place according to law. No sooner had he arrived there, than he declared himself a candidate for the presidency and openly opposed the campaign in behalf of Firman, who at the time also was staying at Cape Haitien. During the election, an open breach between Firmin and Nord occurred, and there was fighting between their partisans. Nord was backed by the regular army—Firmin by his friends and the gunboats of Haiti, under command of Admiral Killick. After three days fighting, Firmin and his friends were compelled to leave Cape Haitien for Gonaives, in the district of General Jean Jumeau. Notwithstanding his defeat, Firmin was elected to the National Assembly, and all other elections were decided equally in his favor.

Jean Jumeau immediately took up arms in behalf of Firmin and advanced on Port-au-Prince, while a second army, under General Seneque Pierre, marched from Gonaives, in the opposite direction, on Cap Haitien.

In the north, the followers of Firmin have been repulsed, and, according to latest advices, General Nord is marching upon Gonaives, where Firmin established a Provisional Government under his own presidency. Jean Jumeau, checked in his movements against Port-au-Prince, has had to hurry back to the defense of Gonaives. Meanwhile, part of the South, under the leadership of General Antoine Simon, has declared itself in favor of Firmin.

It is probable that serious bloodshed will follow, and the life and property of both natives and foreigners is seriously endangered. A late cablegram announces the capture of Gonaives by Firmin. Poor country in which such conditions are possible! Poor black race, for whom Haiti is the experimental station of independent government!

ARTHUR SCHULER.

HAITIAN NATIVE TROOPS ON THE MARCH

of General Sam's administration, was now put forward by the South; to him is attributed the unfortunate financial system under which Haiti suffered so much till lately. In Port-au-Prince, affairs crystallized around Pierre, who earned his fame in distilling rum, but in nothing else.

The candidate of the north was Antenor Firmin, a man of talent, who represented his country, until recently, as Minister to France, and who played an important and honorable part under Hypolite.

After the dissolution of the two Houses of Parliament, committees of public safety were formed in all cities to curb the half anarchistic tendencies of the populace, and finally arrangements were made for a Provisional Government, under former President Canal.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

M. J. B., Palestine, Texas, writes:

A few weeks since I was in great trouble, and I was feeling that I had been unjustly treated by those who ought to have been my friends. But I carried the matter to the Father in earnest, faithful prayer, and his answer and help came—so plain there was no mistaking.

W. A. H., Rossmoyne, O., writes:

I know God hears and answers prayer. Sometimes he gives us the evidence within ourselves that he grants our petition, but not always. We must accept by faith, for "we walk by faith and not by sight." Many times in the last year, he has answered my petitions, and helped me in times of trouble, when I could see no earthly way out of surrounding difficulties. Let us have more faith in his promises, and thereby glorify his holy name.

A. S., Greenwich, N. Y., writes:

I have had a great many prayers answered. Once, before I was through praying, the answer came.

A father, Hallettsville, Tex., writes:

I was in trouble. I prayed for a wayward child, for wisdom and understanding in family government, for health, peace, contentment and prosperity, and for help in business. I now acknowledge that God has answered my prayer.

L. C. R., Lowell, Mass., writes:

Having read the answers to prayers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I was encouraged to pray more earnestly, and the dear Lord has heard. He is an all-wise and loving Father. Bless his holy name!

W. S. W., Jefferson, Md., writes:

I had been very ill. I prayed God to make me well and give me employment. I am not entirely recovered, but my improvement is so great that friends say they would not think me the same man, and I have sought till I found employment, such as the doctor said I needed to help along my improvement. I did not stop taking medicine, but I asked God's blessing on it.

Mormons and the Gospel

Rev. Charles Higgins, a reader of this journal in Ogden, Utah, writes:

"I have been told this morning that one of your sample copies, which was sent to a man in Malad, Idaho (a Mormon town), was taken to a saloon. Dr. Talmage's sermon was read in the saloon, and suppose all parties concerned were Mormons."

Any reader who is interested in the work among the Mormons can assist by sending old copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, or other religious papers or tracts to the following Presbyterian missionaries: Rev. W. T. King, Colliston, Utah, and Rev. W. A. Hough, Malad, Idaho. Literature sent to either of these persons, can be properly distributed by them, as they are near towns which are entirely Mormon (Latter-Day Saints).

What is an All-Round Christian Life?

EMINENT AUTHORITIES DEFINE IT IN TERMS THAT ALL CAN UNDERSTAND

THERE are many people, both pastors and laymen, to whom the simple, concise definition of "What constitutes a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life?" would be a most difficult task. Excellent people and thoroughly good Christians, they still find it hard to make it clear to others. Yet it is a question more frequently asked of professing Christians than any other question in the world.

REV. C. H. SHELDON

In order that a clear, straightforward, and concise explanation of the all-round, practical Christian life might be placed before the great army of earnest inquirers everywhere, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has invited some of the most eminent authorities in this land on practical Christianity, to send us their individual interpretation. These gentlemen, whose letters appear below, are Bishop Vincent, of the Methodist Church (the founder of the Chautauqua movement); the Rev. H. Clay Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times; the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps; the Rev. C. H. Yatman, the world-wide evangelist; the Rev. A. B. Simpson, founder of the Christian Alliance; Mr. James Eads How, the St. Louis philanthropist; Rev. Amory H. Bradford, of Montclair, N. J.; and Mr. W. R. Moody, the spiritual leader of

REV. A. B. SIMPSON

Northfield, and son of America's best beloved evangelist. These letters, as a whole, constitute a very remarkable symposium, and one that cannot fail to be spiritually helpful and inspiring to all who read them.

"A Supreme Love for God and for Man are the essentials," writes Pastor Chas. H. Sheldon

In answer to your question, What constitutes a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life? I would reply briefly as follows: The most healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life grows out of the foundation of the human life upon the two great fundamental, essential principles announced by Christ; a supreme love for God and a supreme love for man. There is no such thing as a healthy Christian life unless it is rooted and grounded in those two absolute essentials. On that foundation is built up the whole of a complete Christian manhood. There is no such thing as developing Christian life by any process known to civilization or culture or family training or environment which does not embody in the whole being those two principles. We can safely leave the details of the development of any life to be determined by everything else connected with a person's surroundings, his advantages, his responsibilities, his natural growth—all these details will spring from the fundamental principles; but if those principles are lacking, everything else will be artificial. I would answer, in brief, that any Christian life will be healthy, satisfying and all-round which is founded upon the two absolute essentials of all life—love to God the Father, love to man the brother.

J. EADS HOW

CHARLES M. SHELDON.

Central Church, Topeka, Kan.

"Have Christ and the Love of Christ as the Basis of every Action," writes Will R. Moody

Christianity is neither a philosophy nor a creed; but a relationship to a person—Jesus Christ. Hence, a healthy, all-round, satisfying Christian life, is one which has Christ and the love of Christ as the basis of every action. In proportion as Christ is the basis, is the life healthy, satisfying, and all-round. Healthy, because complete; satisfying, because he who is the bread and the water of life, alone can satisfy; all-round, because only the life which has a fixed centre can be symmetrical and well balanced. Christianity furnishes not only the highest ethical standard; but alone, of all religions, it furnishes the dynamics for its attainment.

East Northfield, Mass. W. R. MOODY.

"Our rule of life should be to do as Christ would have us do," writes Rev. H. Clay Trumbull

The question "What constitutes a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life?" deserves a thoughtful and God-given answer.

Jesus Christ was sent into this world to more fully disclose God to man, and to better show man how God would have man live as a child of God, and as a lover and helper of man in God's service. This being the case, every man is given a plain and sure guide as to the course God would have him pursue.

The spirit of Jesus toward God and toward man is our safe example and pattern in our course through life. The record in the New Testament makes this course clear. All of us have the guide, and every one of us may know that "if any man hath not the spirit of Christ he is none of his."

As Christ would have us do to our fellow-men, we ought to do. He gives us an example, and he would have us do according to his pattern, and according to his explicit teaching. Our rule of life should be to do as he would have us do. We are not to attempt to do as Jesus would do if we were in his place; for as to that we cannot know, and we have no explicit teaching or guidance. But we are to do in all circumstances as Jesus would have us do, and as to that we can be sure.

Why should any person be in doubt as to man's duty in his seeking to live a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life? The spirit, and the example, and the teachings of Jesus make that clear before all.

Philanthropist James Eads How's interpretation of the True Christian Life

I have just received your letter. You ask, "What constitutes a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life?" To a great extent that is what nearly every one has to work out an answer for himself, I suppose. But no doubt the highest type of life is that which lives out as much as it possibly can of itself and its soul-dreams, while endeavoring to keep its mind open for more light, and its heart prepared for larger visions; thus ever growing in grace and truth.

We Must Walk with Christ in all Spheres of Human Life and Activity, writes Bishop Vincent

The true, the only true Christian life, is life, not dogma, not ceremony, not esthetic sentiment. These all have their normal and necessary place, but must be vitalized to be of any value. The life that is "Life indeed" affects the whole man—body, intellect, feeling, moral sense, will, speech, action, habit, occupation, recreation, unconscious influence. It is a force of character, interior and radical—the force of the hidden springs and of the current in a lake or river—not the movement of winds playing on the surface. And this force, out of which comes the "Christian life," is not at all a matter of "culture." One cannot be trained into it by any development of natural human endowments or faculties. "Self-culture" cannot create it. It is all a question of Christ—what he is to us, what he does for us. It is just like the planet Earth and the Sun. The perpetual hold of Christ upon us is like the perpetual hold of the sun upon the earth. The earth cannot warm itself at the sun, and then swing off on its own account, to be a source of light and heat—light and heat which it won from the sun, and now gives at second-hand, independently of the sun. The constant hold of the sun on the earth is the only hope of the earth. All that earth can do is to let the sun have its own way, and yield to him. So Christ is our all and in all, and is always our all. There is none other. Our hope is in him. Our faith rests in him. Our life comes from him. To be sure, we are free. Well, if the earth were a free and intelligent being the best it could do would be to let the sun have its radiant and regal way with it, and to swing in its orbit and turn and turn towards the sun, just as it does. So we as believers in the Sun of Righteousness—his planets, his disciples attain our best by doing his will, by letting him do his will in and for and by us. The answer to the question you ask, Mr. Editor, is this: Surrender to Christ; rest in Christ; study the teachings of Christ; believe in the promises of Christ; leave everything with Christ; share the life, possess the Spirit of Christ; walk with Christ in all spheres—domestic commercial, scientific, political, religious, recreative. That guarantees "a hearty, satisfying, all-round Christian life." Nothing else can.

"Live in Fellowship with Christ, draw our strength from Him, and give out freely to others," writes Rev. A. B. Simpson

Replying to your request of June 20th, that I should tell of in "What constitutes a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life," I beg to say this: To know, to receive, to possess the Lord Jesus Christ as a living, indwelling, All-sufficient Presence, and every moment draw from him by conscious personal fellowship, life and strength for spirit, soul and body, and give it out in turn to others, in spontaneous and unselfish service, in all our various stations and relations, as God gives us opportunity—this constitutes one hundred hundredths of a healthy, satisfying, all-round Christian life.

A. B. SIMPSON.

"Accept Christ, and then make a Life-long Struggle to Help Others," writes Evangelist Yatman

An all-round Christian life is possible, in spite of the wasting and twisting power of doubt and the devil. It is a mighty, energizing force in itself to feel, by faith, that the Gospel is equal to its promise, and that bad people can really be made good, and kept so. Failure will face every one who tries to live a Christian life on the basis of morals and ethics, fed by the fancy food of fashionable church life. Christ alone can make a Christian. He, imparts what man must have, and what only God can give—Life. In the statement, "He that hath the Son, hath life," is bound up not only a philosophy, but a fact as true and sure as that crops must come if people live. There is neither spiritual health for the soul, nor is there food for the heart apart from the Balm of Gilead and the bread from heaven.

It will be no holiday nor sham-battle when a small, mean, stingy, sour sinner gets converted, and begins the battle of helping God make him a big, broad, liberal, sweet saint. Talk of an "all-round Christian life," this is the day when it is not only possible, but altogether desirable. The twelfth of Romans or fifteenth of John, or third of Ephesians, in real, genuine flesh and blood, set walking up and down the earth, would not only "satisfy" the One who walks that way, but would gratify the whole host of heaven.

Be as honest as a sunbeam in throwing your heart open to Christ, and then fling your whole being into a life-long, passionate struggle "to help the other fellow for Christ's sake."

"Know the Truth, do the Right and Trust the Father in All Things," writes Rev. A. H. Bradford

He who, in the spirit of Jesus, makes it the purpose of his life to know the truth and to do the right, and who trusts that the Father, who is revealed in Jesus Christ, will do that which is best for all men in time and eternity, in my opinion is a Christian.

A DOXOLOGY SUNG IN A FLOUR BARREL

BY THE LATE H. B. GIBBUD, EVANGELIST

It is one thing to trust God when the flour barrel is full, when there is money in the bank to fall back on and when the wages are coming in regularly. It is quite another thing to trust God when the barrel is empty, the money in the bank is gone, and no wages are coming in. I had often said in public talks, "It takes real faith in God to be able to put our head into an empty flour barrel and sing a doxology."

My wife had heard me say this, and not long since she called me to come to the kitchen. I said, "What do you want me for?" She replied, "I want you to come out here and sing." I thought this queer, so went out to see what it all meant.

In the centre of the floor was an empty flour barrel she had just dusted out.

"Now, my dear," said she, "I have often heard you say one could put his head into an empty flour barrel and sing, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' if he believed what God said. Now here is your chance; practice what you preach."

There was the empty flour barrel staring at me with open mouth; my pocket-book was empty as the barrel; I was not on a salary, and knew of no money that was coming in. I do not know that my wife enjoyed my preaching, but she was evidently bent on enjoying my practicing. I looked for my faith and could not find it; I looked for a way of escape, but could not find that, my wife blocking the door of exit with the dust-brush covered with flour.

I said, "I will put my head in and sing on one condition."

"What's that?" said my wife.

"The condition that you will put your head in with me. You know you promised to share my joys and sorrows."

She consented; so we put our heads in and sang the long-metre doxology. I will not say what else we did, but we had a good time; and when we got our heads out, we were a good bit powdered up, which we took as a token that there was more flour to follow.

Sure enough, though no person knew of our need or of the empty barrel, the next day a grocery man called with a barrel of flour for the Gibbuds! Who sent it, or where it came from, we never knew.

I have joined with a thousand voices in singing the grand old doxology; I have sung it in many a fine church building, also in the open air under the blue canopy of heaven; but there is something very peculiar about the sound of the song when sung in an empty flour barrel under the foregoing conditions. I have repeated the experience once or twice with the same result, though now I never spend time in looking for my faith; I simply apply for flour at Phil. 4: 19, and then sing, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

The Lot of the Miner

SINCE the publication of our recent series of articles from a special correspondent, on "Child Slavery in the Mines," we have received a number of letters from readers in the coal districts of Pennsylvania, all of whom are more or less conversant with the situation. In some of these letters, the miner is defended; in others the Company. It is not the purpose of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, however, either to discuss the strike, or to pronounce judgment as to the causes of the peculiar social and industrial conditions prevalent in the mining region; its object is to present the miner, his life and his surroundings, precisely as they are to be found to-day. Perusing this presentation, the reader can easily reach his own conclusions.

We are glad to believe that there are many bright spots in this otherwise dark and gloomy atmosphere of the mines; that there are homes that are happy, and districts where the conditions are more fortunate for the miner, and where his little ones have a chance to know something of real child-life and its delights, and an opportunity for intelligent development. But these are mere gleams amid the gloom, and serve, by contrast, to emphasize the sad general conditions. If our correspondent's letters have served to introduce to the great outside world the striking miner, his little son, who toils in the dusty breaker, and his daughter, who is doomed to pass what should be the sweetest hours of her childhood in a stocking mill—if this species of pitiful slavery has been truthfully and clearly impressed upon the reader's mind, then the object aimed at will have been accomplished. It is not difficult to foresee what direction the sympathy will take. There may be, and doubtless there are, faults on both sides in the social and industrial situation at the mines; but if the picture outlined in these articles holds true, even in "prosperous times," there is surely something radically wrong with a system that robs childhood of its sweetest privilege, youth of its brightest hopes, and maturity of nearly all that goes to make up well-rounded American manhood and womanhood. In all lands where child-labor prevails, the race deteriorates physically as well as morally. Our own country cannot expect to be the sole exception to the general rule.

Our Boy Soldiers

ONE of the most important departures we have yet made in our educational system is that outlined in a dispatch from Washington last week. It announces that one hundred army officers are to be detailed to the schools and colleges of the States and Territories to give military instruction on lines laid down by the War College Board. No institution is to have the benefit of the course conducted by an officer, unless it guarantees that at least one hundred pupils will avail themselves of the opportunity. This means that at least ten thousand boys will have a training in military tactics. Besides giving instruction, it is proposed to supply rifles and ammunition, and in some cases small pieces of artillery, for the use of the students.

This project is a practical outcome of the utterances to which we called attention some weeks ago, in which men, eminent in the Government, expressed the conviction that the United States must expect, soon or late, to be involved in war. It is a step of preparation for a calamity which, should it come, every Christian will deplore. We may congratulate ourselves that it is better than the system of some European governments, which require a period of military service from every citizen, but it is a step of ominous import. It is true that a system of drill will tend to the physical development of the pupils, and that in an emergency, we may have reason to be thankful that thousands of citizens were familiarized at school with the rudiments of military science; but the very fact of such a project being adopted, implies a danger which, in these days of Christian progress, should not exist. The adage, that in times of peace we should prepare for war, is one that we had but little occasion to observe. But it is evident that the Government now foresees the possibility of war becoming a necessity to the maintenance of our prestige as a nation, and is adopting precautions.

The true patriot would grieve if our Government were compelled to submit to insult and suffer wrong, through its incapacity to take the field against a foreign foe. We want our national honor maintained and our rights and liberties protected, but it is grievous to think that an exigency may arise when that can be done only by fighting. It is sad that a nation so peaceful as ours, should have to teach its boys the use of deadly weapons and train them to make the most effective military formations. The project seems to push further from us that glorious period, for which we hope and pray, when men shall learn war no more.

Simplifying Life

HOW this feeling of many things to be done taxes and oppresses us! How restless and fretted we get under it! So much to do—so much! So fearful that we shall not get through our work! Each day a wearying strain to accomplish a multitude of duties! But life, Christian life, is really very simple. There need be no perplexity, no worry, no bustling, no despondency and heart-sickness about failures, no anxiety about the particular nature or quantity or place of our work, if we remember that Christ himself has summed it all up in one thing.

Suppose a man who had never seen a great machine shop, and knew little of the power of steam or water, were set down in a great room, full of lathes and looms and circular saws, and required to set the machinery in motion. How many men he would call in! How many separate contrivances he would apply to each machine! How he would bustle about from wheel to wheel, from lathe to lathe, now heaving away at a great trip-hammer, now cutting his fingers on a circular saw, now turning round the driving-wheel of a lathe! And at this point the experienced engineer comes in, and laughs as he sees the poor man's perplexity. He says to him, "My friend, all this trouble is unnecessary. See here how simple it is." And with that he slips a belt over a drum and pulls a lever, and lo! the whole place is in a whirl—lathes, saws, trip-hammers, all in motion, without a hand on any of them.

So we ask ourselves anxiously how we can ever deal with such a mass of duties, and it does not occur to us that we may get at the details of service by a shorter process; that we may come under the power of an impulse which will make duty always a delight instead of drudgery; a single principle which will carry all duties and all services along with it—the impulse of supreme love to Christ, the principle of absolute abandonment to the will of God. With only that, duty, in its multitude of forms, becomes a new thing, simple and sweet.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Celestial Escort

—IN MANY a Christian departure that you have known and I have known, there was in the phraseology of the departing ones something that indicated the reappearance of those long deceased. It is no delirium, no delusion, but a supernal fact. Your glorified loved ones will hear that you are about to come, and they will say in heaven, "May I go down and show that soul the way up? May I be the celestial escort? May I wait for that soul at the edge of the low?" And the Lord will say, "Yes; you may fly down that mission." And I think all your glorified kindred will come down, and they will be in the room; and although those in health standing around you may hear no voice, you will see no arrival from the heavenly world, you will see and hear the cry will be, "Follow me! Up this way! By this gilded cloud, a-past these stars, straight for home, straight for glory, straight for God!"

Modern Cruelty

—THE DIOCLETIANS are not all dead. The cellars lead into the arena of life's struggle are not all emptied of the tigers. The vivisection by young doctors of dogs and cats and birds most of the time adds nothing to human discovery but is only a continuation of Vespasian's Colosseum. The cruelties of the world generally begin in nurseries and home circles and in day schools. The child that transfixes a fly with a pin, or the low feeling that sets two dogs into combat, or that bullies a weak or crippled playmate, or the indifference that starves a canary bird, needs only to be developed in order to make a first-class Nero or a full-armed Apollyon. It would be a good sentence to be written on the top line of a child's book, and a fit inscription to be embroidered in the armchair of the sitting-room, and an appropriate motto to judge and jury and district attorney and sheriff to look at the court-house: "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

Gospel Heroics

—MAY THE eternal God rouse us all to action! As I myself, I feel I would be ashamed to die and enter heaven until I have accomplished something more decisive than the Lord that bought me. I would like to join with you in an oath, with hand high uplifted to heaven, swearing my allegiance to Jesus Christ, and to work more for his kingdom. Are you ready to join with me in some new work for Christ? I feel that there is such a thing as claustral piety; that there is such a thing as insular work; but what we need is concerted action. The temple of Berith is very broad, and it is very high. It has been going up by the hands of men and devils, and no human engineering can demolish it, but if the one hundred and fifty thousand ministers of Christ in this country should each take a branch of the tree of life and all their congregations should do the same, and should march on and throw these branches around the great temples of sin and worldliness and folly, it would need no match or coal or torch of ours to touch off the pile; for, in the days of Elijah, fire would fall from heaven and kindle the bonfire of Christian victory over demolished sin. It is kindling now! Huzza! The day is ours!

Restorative Religion

—DID YOU ever carry a bouquet into a sick room? Did you ever put a bundle of flowers in a pale hand and then see how the cheek flushed and how the eye flashed? Any doctor will tell you there is a time when a bundle of flowers may decide the case. Just in the crisis of the disease, and the patient is doleful and depressed, a bunch of flowers comes in and the patient is hopeful and convalescent. The flowers are so very restorative, and they make me think of Christ. I have been in a sick room after a consultation with physicians had been held, and they said there was no hope and this grace of God, symbolized by the flowers—this grace of Jesus Christ—lifted the soul as by a divine restorative. The hand of Christ is the softest pillow, the pardon of Christ is the strongest stimulus, the comfort of Christ is the mightiest anodyne, the salvation of Christ is the grandest restorative. There is not a fever, there is not a neuralgia, there is not a consumption, there is not a marasmus but the grace of God will help.

Take Care of the Children

—O CHRISTIAN PARENT, whatever you do for your children, or neglect to do, do not neglect their eternal salvation. Do not make the mistake of that family, who, when the house was on fire, secured all the household goods, but forgot to ask, until too late, "Are the children safe?" Oh, what a terrific neglect! When the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the world shall burn, will your children be safe?

PRINCE CHEN

A Royal Visitor

NEVER before has America welcomed a Chinaman of rank so exalted as Prince Chen, who reached our shores on August 9. He is a cousin of the Emperor of China, and son of the statesman whose office in China corresponds with our Secretary of the State Department. Though only twenty-seven years old, the fact that he is of royal blood gives him a prestige in China second only to the Emperor and Empress. He had been in England to represent China at the coronation, and was on his way back, via New York and Vancouver, to Peking. With him in his suite was Sir Lian Chen Tung, who next year will succeed Wu Ting-Fang, the present popular minister to this country. Minister Wu was on hand to meet him when he stepped from the steamer, and with him were the most important Chinese officials, who greeted the Prince with the most impressive ko-tows. The Prince bore himself with great dignity, and though only five feet high, needed no one to point out who was the central figure of the ceremony of welcome. He was distinguished from all the other members of the party by his yellow jacket, the badge of his rank, a plume of black feathers with the official peacock feather in his hat, which was surmounted by a gold-mounted ball of red coral, which, to a Chinaman, implies royalty. Chinatown donned gala attire, in honor of the imperial representative's visit. Lanterns were strung across the streets, flags hung from every window, and every one had put on his finest raiment. The merchants of the quarter sent fruit and other gifts to their Prince. On Monday, the party visited President Roosevelt at Oyster Bay, and the Prince informed him that he had come to his country at the special command of the Empress to express her thanks to the head of the nation for the services rendered by our Government to China in her recent troubles. During his stay, the Prince was entertained by Minister Wu with a real Chinese dinner of fifty courses. On other days, he ate American food at the Waldorf Hotel, where he stayed. Mayor Low absented himself from the city during the visit of the illustrious guest, but his Secretary and the President of the Board of Aldermen gave him cordial welcome. He was driven around the city to see the Stock Exchange, the Brooklyn Bridge, and other sights, in which he was deeply interested. He was immensely impressed by the tall buildings and by the hurry and activity of the people in the streets, which contrasted strongly with the scenes in a Chinese city. One of his most impressive visits was to the tomb of General Grant. During his European travels he had visited the tombs of Napoleon and Queen Victoria, but he evidently considered her resting place of the great American soldier a shrine of greater interest. On the evening of August 2, after a visit crowded with sight-seeing, he took his departure for Vancouver, whence he will sail for China. He will take back with him impressions of our national greatness which may be useful in the development of his native land. The most useful of all, however, which it is much to be wished that he could have received is that the true source of a nation's greatness is the Christianity which China rejects.

Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people (Prov. 14:34).

Death of the Famous Bible Illustrator

The wonderful French artist, James Joseph Tissot, who did more than any other painter to make the scenes of Christ's life real to us, died on August 9. Several of his pictures have at intervals been reproduced in the pages of this journal, so that our readers know something of the magnificent genius of the man. He was sixty-six years of age, and had been prominent among French artists and illustrators for forty years. He was born at Nantes, and studied in the best Parisian art schools. His works, in the early part of his career, were of the social life of the French capital, which he depicted with the closest fidelity. One day, during his production of a series of pictures of types of French women, he went to a Roman Catholic Church to get a type of the religious woman. During the service, the grandeur and character of Christ swept over his mind like a vision, and he determined to devote himself to the portrayal of Gospel scenes. He went to Palestine and lived there for several years, studying Jewish Oriental life. The result was five hundred pictures, in which the scenes of Palestine were drawn with the closest accuracy and the central figure of Christ was depicted with sympathy and the profoundest veneration. Not even in the pictures of Holman Hunt was there such an attention to detail, and he succeeded in making the scenes of the divine life vivid beyond any of his predecessors. It is gratifying to know that the entire series has been presented to the American people, and they are to be exhibited permanently by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. It was a wonderful triumph to present in such impressive form the conception of Christ in his life. Not often does an artist rise who is had seen nothing quite so beautiful before. A little girl of six years heard the shouts of ecstasy and ran to the window of the tenement in which she lived. She could not go down to the street, because the door was fastened, but she could not miss so rare a sight and she stepped on the fire-escape. She stood entranced for a moment, but felt she must get nearer to it. So, forgetting the aperture, through which the ladder is reached, she ran along the escape and dropped through to the sidewalk, where she was picked up with a fractured skull. The hospital doctors regard her condition as critical, but are doing their utmost to save her life. We sincerely hope she will recover, and that when she grows up, the painful experience of her childhood will not lead her to keep her eyes so closely on her path, that she will miss the sight of heavenly beauty. She may be assured, that in seeking spiritual beauty, she will have the promise fulfilled.

Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble (Prov. 3:23).

BRIEF NOTES

Rabbi Martin A. Meyer, of San Francisco, who has just returned from Palestine, reports that there are in Jerusalem 45,000 Jews who are in abject poverty, unable to obtain work and needing relief.

It is reported that an urgent call has been presented to Dr. Gunsaulus, of Chicago, to remain in England, where he has been preaching this summer. The pulpit offered him is said to be that now occupied by the venerable Dr. Joseph Parker.

A largely attended conference on tithing was held at Winona Lake, Ind., on Aug. 12-14. The conference was called by Rev. Frank Otis Ballard, D.D., and a number of other ministers who desire to get the principle of tithing generally adopted by Christians of all denominations.

It is gratifying to learn that the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association has received the pledges for endowment to the extent of a million dollars, which was the condition imposed by the generous friend of the movement, who offered a quarter of the total sum. During the past thirty years the gifts to the Young Men's Christian Association aggregate over $20,000,000.

The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle had, at its rallying day this year, delegates from all parts of the United States, Canada and the Bermudas. The reports indicated a large increase in the number of circles, some of which have a hundred members. One of the most important features of the Assembly this year was the able paper on the Philippine problem, presented by Dr. John G. Schurman, President of Cornell University, and a member of the Government Philippine Commission. Bishop Vincent preached the Baccalaureate sermon.

capable of dealing satisfactorily with so sublime a subject, but the humblest Christian has the opportunity of showing to the world a view which Christ himself prefers to any picture—his character reproduced in life.

Beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord we are transformed into the same image (II. Cor. 3:18).

The Rainbow Lured Her

A sad accident occurred in New York, last week. After the severe thunderstorm of Monday, the clouds broke suddenly and the sun shone out in all its glory. The result was a rainbow of rare beauty. One child in the tenement districts carried the news of the phenomenon to another, and soon the sidewalks were crowded with little ones, who, in the course of their short lives,

THE FAMOUS SEA-SWEPT "BOARD-WALK"

REV. C. H. YATMAN

ON THE SANDS AT OCEAN GROVE

Camp-Meeting Time at Ocean Grove

By...
REV. C. H. YATMAN

A GROVE by the ocean, where the voice of many waters is lost in the louder chorus of a great multitude, who sing the songs of Zion and worship God by altars that burn with fires of fervency and zeal. Its history, like itself, is unique. In three and thirty years there has been a literal fulfillment of the prophecy of Isaiah in Chapter 35. It is on the Atlantic shore, fifty miles below New York. Once a wild waste of sand dune, underbrush, wild grass and old pine; now a garden of beauty, a habitation of teeming thousands, and so quiet, peaceful and good, that there a Sabbath Day is like a fragment of the New Jerusalem.

There is no place like it in all the round, wide world. Here you find tents, far better than the redeemed Israelites ever knew; but with the same romantic and free life in them; cottages big and little, some as primitive as pine boards, others as elegant as culture can conceive. Hotels by the score. Twenty, thirty, forty, fifty thousand people, of a summer's day; getting health for body and soul, by bath and breeze, by song and sermon, by boat and band, by oration and oratorio, by idleness and instruction, by temple and teaching. The giddy whirl of the world is shut out, and in its place, music and entertainment of a high order, amuse and ennoble the throng.

This year, apparently more than ever before, the religious life of Ocean Grove is exerting its peculiar charm upon the visiting multitudes.

Bishop J. N. Fitzgerald, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the President of the Association, has over a score of strong Methodist ministers and laymen associated with him in the management, including the Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard, Vice-President, and Mr. John E. Andrus, Treasurer. Professor Tali Esen Morgan, who has charge of the singers and musicians, has this year the largest choir ever known at the Grove. His renditions of "Elijah" or the "Messiah" are inspiring sermons for the multitude. To listen to ten thousand people singing the grand old hymns of the church, at a Sabbath morning or evening service in the Auditorium, is, beyond doubt, one of the finest musical effects to be found anywhere in the world.

Every morning, a service is held in the Janes Memorial Tabernacle for the higher Christian life, Bishop Fitzgerald, Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard, and Dr. J. H. Alday having charge. In the temple, every morning, there is a Young People's Meeting, which is called "The Sunshine Hour," because of the brightness and simplicity of the Gospel, as it is presented in song, saying and sermon. The young folks come by the thousand, and the old folk also. Often scores go without breakfast to be in time to get a seat, or to get inside the doors. The present leader, Rev. Charles H. Yatman, has conducted this meeting for twenty-two consecutive years. The temple has been enlarged and reconstructed four times, for want of room, and now a new one is proposed, to be twice the present size. Possibly the stated object of this service, namely, "To make bad people good, and good people better," is the secret of its success.

Just now, religious life at Ocean Grove is at its height, while the annual Camp-Meeting is being held. The preaching and Gospel invitations are as pointed and persistent as ever. Often the marvelous scenes of other days are repeated, when many profess conversion or are sanctified. Presbyterian preachers, Baptist preachers, Methodist preachers, Dutch Reformed, Congregational and Evangelical clergymen mingle freely together, and work side by side, in sermon, prayer and counsel, for the extension of the kingdom of Christ.

There are no Sunday trains, no wheels turn in its streets on the Sabbath, liquor saloons and tobacco shops are totally missing, Sunday newspapers are neither hawked or sold; yet, this year, the crowds are greater than ever. Strange as it may seem, many non-religious men bring their families here to enjoy the complete rest. Galilee and the Divine preaching to the multitude on its shore, are reproduced, in part at least, by the Ocean Grove Beach Meetings, held Sabbath evenings at sunset. It is a very weird, sweet picture, to see and hear the thousands on the seashore worship, sing and pray.

There is scarce a State in the Union, or a country in the world that is not represented by visitors, for the fame of the Grove has gone throughout all Christendom.

HOME THOUGHTS IN THE PORCH

By Margaret E. Sangster

ON FAULT-FINDING

AFTER all, the children are the most important class in the universe. "It is wonderful," said a wise man one day, "to watch how they scramble up in spite of and notwithstanding our blunders, and turn out pretty well on the whole." There is a cult of child-training to-day which encloses in its circle a good many devotees, and the calm and debonair way in which people used to bring up large families, is quite out of fashion. But when, as an hour ago, I saw a small boy marauding across the lawn with a big stick, slashing the heads off a bed of nasturtiums, racing the chickens, mauling the family cat, and beating a dear old dog, all unproved by his mother, I longed for old-fashioned discipline. It seems as though in this period we have lost the golden mean. Either we are over-watchful, and score every fault with a penalty, or else we are over-indulgent, and suffer the children to rampage about the premises with the fury of the proverbial "wild bull in a net." Some mothers are so mistaken as to promise punishments to-morrow, and then forget all about them. "You shall have no dessert on Wednesday, Florence (Wednesday is ice-cream day), because you have been so greedy to-day." Florence does not seem impressed, nor frightened particularly, and Gertrude, her sister, aged six, sagely observes, "When I am a lady, and have naughty children, I will always punish them when they do things; not tell them I'll punish to-morrow." Sensible Gertrude! My own opinion is that most of the fault-finding and punishment could be omitted, if only the parents were self-controlled, were large-hearted, and were amiably able to put themselves in the children's place.

"I wish Dorothy had better table manners," says Dorothy's mamma, anxiously. "The Forbes's will be here next week, and Jessie Forbes behaves so beautifully." Well, dear madam, table manners are not learned in a day, nor are they enforced by one admonition, or two, nor do they come by chance. They are the result of ceaseless, automatic imitation; they are acquired insensibly. You must have and practice good manners, if you would see your children models of correct deportment at meals or anywhere else.

It is a pity that so frequently we take the ground that what people shall say about our children is the essential thing. We are most solicitous that they shall appear well; that our friends shall admire them; and so we cultivate in them a spirit of insincerity, of the sham instead of the real. Eternally it is true, that to be is better than to seem. We must not forget that we want our children to be genuine, to be simple and straightforward, as well as to be courteous and polite.

Among the necessities of home training, the children's use of money comes in and pushes itself to the front. Our tendency is to exaggerate the importance of wealth. Continually we speak of the man who has made a great fortune as though he were the splendidly successful man. He may be very successful, if he have generosity, charity, and love to God, plus his stocks and bonds; but he may be just the reverse, if the love of money has eaten into his soul. Money is a trust committed to us by the Heavenly Father. No matter how many acres we own of God's earth, we are only life-tenants upon it, and at last shall have only a narrow bed of it under the green turf and the snow, wherein to lie and rest as the centuries roll on. So why should we exalt money as if it were the main thing to wish for? On the other hand, our children must be taught not to waste money or time or talents or any good gift of God.

A Manifest Duty

When you or I see a man ill-treating his horse, it is not enough that we hold up our hands in horror, and exclaim at his cruelty. Our duty is to remonstrate earnestly and fearlessly, and if this produce no effect, to hand him over to the nearest policeman, asking for his arrest. Next, as humane people, we should follow the case, till the offender is fined. If the horse is old and suffering, it is our duty not to rest till it is mercifully put to sleep, and saved further brutality at the hands of wicked men.

Utilize Odd Minutes

Odd minutes may be used to good advantage by studious or industrious people, who cannot give a long season to anything except their daily work. By the simple plan of keeping her embroidery in the sitting room and taking a few stitches now and then, one lady has finished a quilt which will be an heirloom, so original is its design, so artistic in its execution. A man who found that to know French would help him in business, acquired it by studying a few minutes every evening for a year. A boy who is busy in an office all day has

The Tired Out, Middle-Aged Woman

THE young girl is often tired because she works with a sort of furious determination to finish her task and go to her pastime. Youth works in spurts. The old lady takes life moderately, and keeps going from morning till night. Often she shows a wiry ability to keep up with her work, which is amazing to those who do not know the reserves of old age. It is the middle-aged woman who plods on till she is exhausted, or who has moments of melancholy when life seems not worth living. And yet it is a patent fact that courage, endurance, hope, and the nerve that wins, may be as of fully the dower of the woman beyond forty-five as the girl in her teens. But she must be willing to take some pains to acquire and keep it.

The middle-aged woman is often handicapped by apathy. It does not occur to her as a thing worth while that she shall make an effort to be beautiful, to have clear eyes, a pure complexion, alert muscles and an erect carriage. She gives up to what she supposes to be a relentless necessity, the increase of adipose tissue with time. She submits to the disfigurement of an ungracefully prominent abdomen. She cranes her head forward and curves her shoulders like a bow, and fancies herself unable to walk, to run, to exercise, or to do any of the pleasant things that girls do as a matter of course. "We all do fade as a leaf," she says piously, and proceeds on her respectable, middle-aged way, as if the outworn apothegm had still a remnant of truth in its sighing cadence.

It is not true. We need none of us fade like a leaf. Leaves grow more and more beautiful till they wither and drop softly down on some sweet, predestined autumnal day, into their final sleep. So ought we. Not by the aid of cosmetics, not by the adventitious effect of anything put on; but from wise, constant and intelligent attention to sane and sound principles of daily living, middle-aged and elderly women should grow more beautiful and more vigorous to the end of their lives.

There is a lazy arm-chair and sofa habit which saps energy as surely as cocaine or opium. A woman has only to withdraw from the front and lop down in the wings of the stage, to be forgotten; and worse, to be an encumbrance in the way of others. Once let it be generally understood that Madame is to be excused from any pursuit or engagement involving exertion, and presently she will be treated as if she were an old lady. Indeed, she might as well pin on a label and be classified at once. For, in this world of intense competition, the person who drops out, very seldom recovers lost ground. And, physically, our salvation is to ignore the impertinences of time, and march right on, fearing nothing and daring everything.

The middle-aged woman needs to be fed. She should take care that her food assimilates. She does not use her thinking powers aright if she persists in clogging the wheels of life with sweets and fats to an inordinate degree, or if she starve herself by a too limited bill-of-fare. Her temptation is to fly to crutches, when the power to stand should be in herself. Stimulants, narcotics, and various temporary aids to digestion, or foes to pain present themselves to her as desirable. She would best leave them one and all alone, and depend for health on nature's medicaments, on exercise, sleep and simple food.

An interest in life beyond the housekeeping, let it be what it may, some fad, hobby, or favorite pursuit, will be an added guarantee that the middle-aged woman shall retain power, vivacity, charm and health, till she reaches the last station on the wayside road, and steps into immortal youth.

Complaining of the Weather

It is a universal sin, and, of all sins, the most inexcusable, since God ordains the weather, and we cannot change its order. Hot, cold, wet, dry, such as it is, God sends, and we ought to accept it and be thankful.

PAWNING THE WEDDING-RING

"'Tis worn, 'tis light, 'tis little worth," the careful goldsmith said.
 "'Tis worn, and O, 'tis worth so much!" the widowed mourner cried.
 "My girlhood's true love gave it me when I became his bride.
 But we need bread—need everything! And so I pawn my wedding-ring."
 A strange mist dimmed the old man's eyes—he handed back the slender prize.
 "Take with your ring this purse of gold, and forth, my child, in comfort fare,
 And I will count as wealth untold, the widow's thanks, the orphan's prayer."

added to his knowledge of English literature by reading in the cars, on his way to and from work. The sum of wasted odd minutes if computed would foot up to a very respectable total, that might be used as worthwhile capital in the management of one's resources.

A COUNTRY LASSIE

If Jeanie, twelve years old in town,
 And waited on from morn till night,
 Could see her country cousin Jane,
 Who's often dressed by candle-light.
 Could watch her feed the crowd of chicks,
 And see her trot about the house;
 As deft as any grown-up dame,
 As quiet as a little mouse,
 I think it well might come to pass
 That she would see a clever lass.

Resemblances and Contrasts

THE PROPHET LIKE MOSES

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 7
DEUT. 18: 9-19

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"THIS IS OF A TRUTH THAT PROPHET THAT SHOULD COME INTO THE WORLD." JOHN 6: 14

THE dying words of those we love, how often we think about them, and repeat them over and over! And the dying words of those whom the world calls "great," have much interest for us. Moses was a father to the Israelites, and he was also "great," their great lawgiver and leader. His dying words were spoken forty days before his death, probably not all in one day, for his words were many. He was strong enough to speak them all at once, though he was one hundred and twenty years old, for we are told that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." He was a young old man. But the people could hardly have endured to hear all of Moses' good-bye words at one time, nor could they remember them so. And so day after day they gathered together, no doubt, to hear the one who was soon to depart from them.

Let us try to imagine ourselves in their midst. There is only one wide river to cross before they enter the Promised Land, toward which they have been journeying for forty years. They are now just on its borders, in the land of Moab. But their leader is to die before they pass over. Men, women, and children are gathered together on a plain between the mountains. There is no sound of voices, for a solemn hush has fallen upon the assembled multitude. It is more like a funeral than anything else, for they begin to mourn for their leader while he is still with them. There are no outcries, only tear-filled eyes, and choking in throats, and loving hearts almost broken, as they remember harsh words spoken, and disobedient acts. There are anxious hearts too, about who shall take the place of Moses. As they gaze upon the aged but vigorous leader, they wonder why God will take him from them.

And what will Moses say to his people at such a time as this? He tells them to be good. But being good meant so many things: so many things to do, and so many other things not to do, that Moses must name them all, lest they forget. We must read the whole book of Deuteronomy to know just what he did say, and very probably he said even more than that.

We listen, and we hear him begin with the story of how, nearly thirty-eight years ago, they might have entered into their land, but for fear of those whom they called "giants." "Ye rebelled against the commandment of the Lord, your God." We can hear him saying: "Be careful that you do not do so again, lest you may have to wait another thirty-eight years." And Moses strengthens their courage by reminding them of the many kings and enemies God has helped them to conquer. He repeats over again the ten commandments, which are like a chart, showing them the safe places as well as the dangerous rocks that are all along the way of being good. He speaks particularly of idolatry—the worship of idol gods—for he knows that is the greatest temptation they will have when they come to live among the idol worshipers in their Promised Land. He tells them they must have nothing to do with the charmers and the wizards, who profess to do magic things, nor with those who say they can talk with the devil. "These things," he says, "are an abomination unto the Lord." He would have his people know that God alone has power over the living and the dead. He tells them that their hearts must be perfect with the Lord their God, that is, that their love and loyalty must be wholly given to him.

And now he comforts them with the thought that God will give them another leader in his place, who will be to them all that he has been, and more, too. "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, you shall obey him." Can it be that Moses is thinking of Jesus, God's only Son? Sometimes we look into the distance, and we see someone coming, but so dimly that we can hardly tell who it is. Perhaps it was somewhat like this that Moses saw Jesus. Moses could say that Jesus would be like himself, because he would love them, and pray for them, and teach them about obeying and loving the true God. The Prophet was to be like unto Moses, but greater and wiser, for he was God's own Son.

Illustration and Application

What glorious tokens we behold
Of Christ, amid the prophets old!
They speak by his inspiring breath,
And live by his prospective death.

Christ was like Moses, but greater, as (1) Teacher, (2) Intercessor, (3) Lawgiver, corresponding to Christ's three offices of "Prophet, Priest and King."

Before considering Moses' last prophecy of Christ as the prophet like unto him, let us see what other glimpses of Christ Moses had received. Putting together all of the types and symbols and prophecies that pointed to Christ in the five books of Moses, we shall get the complete picture of the expected Messiah, so far as it had been outlined up to the time of Moses' death, as from many lithographic stones, adding color upon color, we get a complete portrait to-day. The picture of Christ that Moses had was but a rude sketch at best, especially when seen in the dim light of his day, though full of significance in the light of fulfilment, as we look back upon it.

To get the full prophetic picture of Christ in any Old Testament period we should not consider the verbal prophecies alone or by themselves, but combine with them all the typical symbols, the typical events, and the theophanies, or visible manifestations of God, four kinds of pictures that should be brought together in one composite photograph.

Even in the Genesis records, which Moses received from his predecessors and knew from childhood, he found a faint patriarchal gospel in promises that not only a Messianic race, but a Messianic Ruler and Redeemer should come from the stars in human form and save men from sin by suffering! In Mrs. Browning's Drama of Exile, after the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Eden, Christ speaks to them thus:

For at last
I, wrapping round me your humanity,
Which, being sustained, shall neither break nor burn
Beneath the fire of Godhead, will tread earth,
And ransom you, and it, and set strong peace
Betwixt you and its creatures. With my pangs
I will confront your sins

Not all that did Adam and Eve hear, though we can hear

MOSES DELIVERING HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE

it and more in the light of fulfilment, from the Jehovah that walked, and spoke in Eden after the fall (3: 8-19) and promised that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, but at the cost of bruising to himself, the acorn promise of a bruised Conqueror, the Saviour-King. The next touch on the picture intensifies the atoning side of Christ's work in the slain lamb of Abel's altar, that dying in his stead, when he deserved to die for his sins, pictured the Lamb of God that was to be laid on the altar-cross to bear the sins of the world (Gen. 4: 4).

Whether Noah saw in the Ark (Gen. 7: 1) an illustration of Christ or not, Christ is to us "the Ark of Safety." And there is little doubt that the story of the ark was at once a historic fact and an acted parable, such parables having always been common in the Orient as illustrations in action. The New Testament, reviewing such events in Old Testament history, says: "These things happened unto them by way of example [literally, for types], and they are written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (I. Cor. 10: 11. See also verse 6.) Noah's altar intensifies the scarlet put into that early picture of Christ by Abel's sacrifice (Gen. 8: 20). The Messianic line, which has hitherto in the "seed of the woman," the promise of a Deliverer, human on the mother's side, is narrowed to the line of Shem—"Let God dwell in the tents of Shem" (Gen. 9: 27)—and then repeatedly it is declared that among Shem's descendants, Abraham is chosen to be the progenitor of the Messiah (Gen. 12: 3; 18: 18). Christ said, "Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad" (John 8: 56). When God pointed Abraham to the stars and said, "So shall thy seed be" (Gen. 15: 5), did he see, as we do in reading that story, the one star brighter than all others, the Star of Bethlehem? The visible Jehovah, that with two angelic attendants came to Abraham's tent (Gen. 18: 1-22), must have been the second person of the Trinity, for "No man hath seen God" [that is, the Father at any time; the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father he hath declared him (John 1: 18). Wherever God is spoken of as seen, it must be the Son, who appeared visibly for brief visits to man in the Old Testament as many times as he spent years on earth in New Testament days. The Jehovah-Jesus who came to Abraham with the assurance that in his old age he should beget the child of promise, and revealed in the same interview the awful punishment that was to fall upon Sodom, corresponds in "goodness and severity" alike to the Christ who in the twenty-fifth of Matthew, with the sevenfold lightning of his seven times uttered, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites," said, in a rain of tears, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, and ye would not!" Here comes in the next narrowing of the Messianic line, which was to be not in Ishmael, but in Isaac (Gen. 21: 8). Abraham's offering of Isaac was all an acted lesson in faith (Gen. 22: 1-19), and however much Abraham saw in it, we see a picture of the divine Father, who, though he spared Abraham's son, "spared not his own Son," but provided in him a Lamb to die in the place of every sinful son of man. Again the Messianic line narrows to Jacob's line rather than Esau's (Gen. 28: 14). Jacob meets the visible Jehovah at night by the brook Jabbok, and mistakes him for a foe, coming from Esau to slay him, but at daybreak finds he has seen the face and felt the blessed touch of the Jehovah-Jesus (Gen. 32: 22-32). There are beautiful illustrations, if not types also, of Christ in the story of Joseph, but the next clear lines in the Messianic picture of Genesis is in the dying words of Jacob, pointing to Judah's tribe as the Messianic one (Gen. 49: 10):

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah,
Nor the ruler's staff from between his feet,
Until Shiloh come;
And unto him shall the obedience of the people be.

All those Genesis prophecies of the coming Messiah, Moses saw like rough sketches in the slave cabin where his mother taught him of God's dealings with his ancestors.

To get the larger gospel of Moses we must add the pictorial gospel of the Tabernacle, and especially the theophanies of Sinai, where the visible Jehovah appeared as at once the Teacher, Intercessor and Lawgiver of his people. It is often overlooked that the Ten Commandments were first spoken in thunders from Sinai to the people (Ex. 20: 1-19). This was done, no doubt, to make the people appreciate their need of an intercessor. Terrified at God's voice, the people cried out to Moses, "Speak thou to us and we will hear, but let not God speak to us lest we die." This shows Moses as an intercessor, in which Christ was to be like him, like Aaron also as High Priest, but greater far than either, a perfect Intercessor, having no lapse of temper such as shut Moses out of Canaan; perfect as Teacher and Lawgiver, also, who gave no laws that even tolerated in men, "for the hardness of their hearts" such evils as divorce and polygamy and slavery.

Moses was like Christ in greatness, more like him than any other, as the Bible indicates when the two names are spoken together in the anthem of heaven, "the song of Moses and the Lamb." Moses' rank as lawgiver is sufficiently shown in that the codes of Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred, the corner-stones of civilization, all began with the Ten Commandments and borrowed largely from other Mosaic laws, but Moses received the Decalogue from Jehovah-Jesus. Christ towers above all great men in greatness, as he towers above all good men in goodness, "the purest among the mighty, the mightiest among the pure."

The life of Moses was full of illustrations of Christ. Moses was cradled, like Christ, in peril and poverty; was like him a plain toiler in his days of preparation for ministry; his commission out of the burning bush corresponded to Christ's at the baptism out of the radiant sky; his words, too, were God-given and attested by miracles; selfish multitudes were about both, whose low ideals daily tried their souls. The water from the rock—symbolized the Christlife in the soul. The uplifted serpent—pictured "life for a look at the crucified One" (John 3: 14). All these and more are in "the Gospel according to Moses."

In the composite photograph of the Messiah from the whole Pentateuch, there are yet other passages that we cannot consider, but Balaam's prophecy must not be forgotten:

I see him, but not now;
I behold him, but not nigh;
There shall come forth a star out of Jacob,
And a sceptre shall rise out of Israel (Num. 24: 17).

The Little Cuban Maid Who Never Smiled!

Felicia, the Wee Orphan, and how she Learned to Laugh at Last — Sad Poverty in Orphan Homes at Matanzas

THIS is the story of Felicia, the little Cuban maid, of whom it was said that she had never been known to smile. She had in her hand a single egg, as she stood there before me.

"How much do you ask for the egg, little one?" I asked the wee Cuban maid. "Seis centavos, Senora." "Oh no, you want tres centavos." "Si, Senora, muy bien," responds Felicia, with the ready acquiescence of the Cuban in accepting just half the amount first asked for a commodity.

A queer little object was this small merchant, clad in a single garment—a little woolen coat with cape, streaked and tarnished with the rays of a tropical sun. It was truly a grotesque and pathetic wardrobe for a little maid of the tropics.

In addition to this, Felicia possessed a treasure of treasures—a battered, faded, little old sun-umbrella, which was worn quite as constantly as the coat; in fact, the coat, at my earnest request, once went to wash, which the parasol never did, though streaked with Cuba's paint-red soil.

Many attempts had been made to induce Felicia to smile, but to no purpose. Though more than an ordinarily bright and attractive girl, she was as solemn and serious as if life had no sunshine. There had been little enough cause for joy in her short life, born as she was while her father was fighting and her mother starving in freedom's cause. She was left motherless when a tiny babe, in the bare little palm hut they called her home. Her father returned to her on crutches, a helpless cripple. She had little food and no care. She heard words of sorrow and bitterness, and saw the shocking things of warfare. What lessons in smiling had she ever had?

I concluded our negotiations and asked, as the egg changed hands: "Felicia, why do you not smile at me?" setting the example to the full extent of my ability. She looked, first with the curious gaze of a wild thing of the forest, then with the interest of the small human animal. Finally she caught the idea of a smile, but only with her eyes; they lightened, they blazed, they twinkled, and then there was a frightened, scurrying little figure fleeing from a new and hitherto unknown sensation.

The next morning, while swinging in my hammock and calculating the time it would take for the "bevahowas" (big black ants) to finish the breakfast of banana leaves and roses with which I had bought immunity for my little flower garden, I heard a gentle stir, and saw a pair of very bright eyes peering around the corner of the house. I called out: "Buenos dias, Amiguita mia, por que no te sonries?" repeating my question of yesterday, in the little girl's own language this time.

My question brought a merry look into the eyes, a softening to the stolid little heroic struggle and ceaseless self-denial.

Rev. H. C. Mayer, an Episcopal pastor from Philadelphia, now in Cuba, writes:

There is great distress all over Cuba. Many very respectable families are almost starving, and both orphans and destitute children with one or both parents abroad. Except in such asilos as ours (in the Matanzas Homes), they are under Catholic training of the lowest and most superstitious kind—so I am sure that any help that you or others can render, could not be better spent.

In Sunday Schools, children are under the influence of the teacher and pastor but one or two hours a week, and the rest of the time in the worst surroundings, while in these Christian orphanages they are every hour of the week under Christian influences.

ily of forty-two, and only partly enough food for the next day. . . . Since writing the above, I have just answered the door bell. A little girl of eleven years, with sad, but beautiful eyes—so common to those with Spanish blood—stood before me. She came to ask if she could put her little brother in the home. Upon questioning her, I found that they had a mother, but she was in the hospital for the insane (as yet there are no Insane Asylums in Cuba) and that the father was dead. There were but two children in the family, herself and a little boy of six years. Young as she is, the little girl was hired out, while the little boy was stopping with a neighbor, who felt that she could not keep him any longer. It is so difficult to say "No" to such cases; and yet, since money has been so scarce, I have sent three boys away, the least needy with the promise that they can come back when money comes. You know all the State orphanage work is concentrated at Havana, so many poor widows will keep their children with them, in hopes that they can care for them in some way, rather than let them go where they cannot see them; but often sickness or illness in some form overtakes them, and then the children are left destitute.

How I long to see a great Christian school here that will gather up all these war children, and now is the time for the most opportune work for the children. Intelligent effort in this direction means much, nothing less than giving to the Republic of Cuba in the future, Christians, instead of illiterate idlers or worse.

Leading Cubans warmly approve of the Matanzas Homes, and, were it not for the general poverty, they would give Mr. Hubbard sufficient support to make such suffering as his orphan charges have lately endured, impossible in the future. But though everybody in Cuba feels the pinch of the "hard times," there are a few generous, self-denying souls who "remember the fatherless." Gen. C. M. de Rojas (formerly of Gen. Gomez's staff, and a graduate of Harvard), a few days ago gave a pleasant surprise to Mr. Hubbard by sending to the Home fifty dollars in American gold, the gift of the city of Cardenas towards the support of the orphans. It came, like a gift straight from heaven, at a time when the larder was bare, and there was no relief in sight. That day was one of thanksgiving indeed!

face, and myriads of little lines about the mouth, showing the almost baby white teeth. Then Felicia laughed! She really laughed—a pretty, tinkling, bubbling laugh, like a little stream playing over its pebbles. Then, suddenly, with eyes like those of a startled fawn, she fled away.

Mr. Hubbard's last letter from the Home at Matanzas, where Felicia was taken, said: "You would hardly know Felicia, she has improved so much. She laughs and cries and expresses her emotions just like other children!"

While poverty and distress prevail in almost every part of Cuba at the present time, owing to the increasing depression in the island's industries, nowhere are they more keenly felt than in the orphanages established in Matanzas and vicinity. These are the institutions founded by Mr. Elmer Hubbard, a benevolent American, who for several years has conducted them personally and kept them going only through an experience of

Rev. H. W. Baker, pastor of the M. E. Church at Matanzas, in a letter just received, says:

I don't know of any enterprise in Cuba that is more deserving than these Hubbard Homes. They occupy a unique position. As to the need—there are hundreds of children in Cuba, especially in Matanzas and province, that need help, material help, and many more who need help of the sort that should be provided by the Christians of the United States. This country is passing a crisis in its history, people here are now suffering for lack of food. . . . Many boys and girls of good size are going to complete moral ruin. My idea for the solving of this is to house and feed the absolutely needy ones—feed some, clothe others—but, above all, have a school, industrial in its arrangements. Teach them the Gospel of work and usefulness; teach them of God and morals.

Miss Cunningham, the matron of one of the Hubbard Homes, writes:

Tuesday (the first of the three days of the great Cuban Independence celebration) we had just forty-two cents on hand for our fam-

Among the Busy Sunshiners

THE sunshine of many kind words and deeds has enlarged the world's joys and lightened its sorrows since the last "Sunshine" story appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mrs. Westover-Alden, the President-General, sends the following letter received by her: "I want to thank you so much, for it was through your kindly publishing my case in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that a ray of Sunshine came my way. I wrote a letter of grateful acknowledgment at once to Dr. Klopsch when the check came. I am still quite weak from my late illness, but am trying to do all the sunshine work I can."

Sunshine in the West

Although there are as yet no well organized branches in Nevada, considerable Sunshine finds its way to headquarters, and individual members do good work in their respective localities. Mrs. Choice Chism, of Reno, remembers headquarters frequently, and many unfortunates have been cheered by her gifts. Invalid members in Arizona, who have gone there for their health, have started Sunshine branches. Some good work is done in the corners of their bungalows. Many beautiful curios have been sent in as dues. Mrs. C. H. Cutting, living on a large ranch near Troy, Arizona, is a bright, cheery Sunshiner, as the little picture of her cosy corner shows. She does much to brighten other lives, and remembers headquarters generously once in a while. There is a Sunshine branch among the Blackfoot Indians of Idaho.

Wanted—Sunbeams

Dale and Mona Glenn are two earnest Sunshiners in Mound City, Mo. Although working hard to spread good cheer, they would appreciate some for themselves.

Robert Hill, Asylum for Incurables, Huntington, W. Va., needs sunshine.

A man and woman who find themselves in their decline of life without a dwelling, would be glad to take care of a house during the holiday absence of owners.

A Carriage Ride for a "Shut-in"

J. B., Poughkeepsie, writes to the President of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch: "My great trial is that I am rarely able to get out in the air. We live upstairs, and I can so seldom get carried down. If some kind friend here would only take me for a carriage ride!" Mrs. G. H. J., in behalf of four Sunshiners of West Derry, N. H., sends $2 to the I. S. S. Ice Fund.

The object of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD branch is to incite the members to kind and helpful deeds, and to thus bring the sunshine of happiness into the greatest possible number of homes. Any one caring to join, will send word to the President, Miss Ella Klein, CHRISTIAN HERALD Office, Bible House, N. Y.

A Wonderful Work

To be a man who can excel one hundred thousand men in any one line is good; to be one in a million is better; but to be the only living man and the second one in the history of the world, who has drawn a perfect single line picture is wonderful! This Mr. Flennig, author and illustrator of "Around the Pan," and "Around the Capital," ($2.00 books, has done in his drawing of McKinley. Price on best Japanese paper, $1.00.

His "Around the Capital," containing one hundred and fifty full-page Washington life pen and ink sketches and five hundred pictures of prominent Americans, including the statesmen, ambassadors and commanders participating in the Spanish-American War—comprising by far the greatest collection of facts and faces ever produced in one volume in condensed form, will interest the entire civilized world. The drawings equal, if they do not surpass, those of John Tenniel's, for which work he was knighted by Queen Victoria. The humor is contagious.

THE "ANGELS" OF SANDY GULCH

By MINNIE ARMSTRONG WHITEMAN

TOM Taylor was a miner in Sandy Gulch. He had "rolled up" a cabin on the western slope for Sally, his wife; staked out a claim, and gone to work with as light a heart as ever a sturdy miner carried in his breast.

Tom worked early and late, washing the dirt and getting out the "dust" for Sally and the baby. The little girl had made her appearance at the cabin early in the spring, and Tom felt a double interest in getting rich now. But things did not go well with him.

Standing so many hours of the day in water up to his knees, panning and working the rocker, had a trying effect upon even so strong a man as he, and one day late in the fall he was taken sick. For months, he was unable to stir.

When spring came again, Tom died, leaving Sally very little with which to take care of herself and child. She resolved to work the claim just as Tom had done.

Red Tim helped her. Tim had been a great friend of Tom's. Some said:

"Tim's gettin' sweet on th' widder."

Tim bestowed little attention on the tattle; but he got a burly Scotchman to help Sally, and paid him out of his own pocket.

The miners were a liberal set of men. When they saw Sally working each day as hard as her poor little hands could work, to take care of herself and "Tom's little one," their hearts were touched, and many a gold nugget was tossed into Mary's lap.

The first year after Tom died, Sally got along pretty well, and she managed to save up a little for a rainy day; but at the close of the summer, which had been unusually hot, she found herself growing weak, "tired," she said. Finally she had to give up work altogether.

Red Tim had gone down to Mexico, where he had a rich claim.

As the weeks and months went by, she saw her slender savings dwindle away, until she came to her last dollar.

There had been a big storm. The snow lay in great drifts along the mountain side, completely enveloping the cabin up to the eaves. Sally was sick in bed, with nobody to help her but little Mary.

"Oh dear," she sighed, as she looked at the dying fire, "if I could only work."

In the agony of her soul she cried aloud "God help me!" as she buried her face in her hands, weeping bitterly.

It was impossible to send the child through the snow to the mines for help. Though the fire was getting low, there was little wood in the house; the flour was out; the last slice of bread was in the cupboard.

"I'll be blessed if I'll wade through such a storm ter look arter any widder agin," said Tim, as he tried to get through the drifts which lay before Sally's cabin. He had been back a week from Mexico. He had asked about Sally, but no one could tell him much.

It was dark, and Tim had hard work to find the door, the wind blew the snow so into his face. At last he got hold of the latch, and raising it, entered the cabin. The wind made such a roar that neither Sally nor the child heard him enter.

There was no light in the room; but Tim could see by the flickering blaze that Sally was in bed in the adjoining room. "The little one" was kneeling by the bedside, praying.

"Please, dear Dod," she pleaded, "make mamma well, cause I'm little an' tant do nuffin. An' dear Dod, please send help right down from heaven, just the way you did in the story my mamma's been tellin' me 'bout. Yo' know, dear Dod, we aint got nuffin ter eat, an' I'm awfu' hungry."

Tim did not wait to hear any more; he went out of the room, closing the door softly after him, so that they would not know he had been there. He pulled out his big, red handkerchief, and rubbed his eyes vigorously.

"That snow blinds me," he said, choking down the lump which persisted in rising in his throat. "To think Tom's widder an' 'little one' haint got anything to eat!"

Tim went down to the "Grizzly," the leading hotel in Sandy Gulch, where all important questions were settled. The office was full when Tim entered. He said, so every one in the room could hear him: "Pards, I want every one of you to listen to the yarn I've got to spin."

In an instant every man was on his feet, crowding around Tim. Every one in the camp who knew Tim, knew that something unusual was coming.

"What's up, Tim?" they inquired.

"We're a fine set of galoots to let any one in Sandy Gulch starve, an' th' diggings panning out thousands. I tell you, pards, I feel meaner than any coyote to-night."

"Who's starvin'?" asked all at once.

"Every one of you knew Tom Taylor, an' you knew he was as straight as a gun-barrel, an' many's th' lift he's given every one of us. Tom's widder an' 'little one' are starvin'. They haint got no wood nor grub stake."

"Thunder an' lightning!" came from Jack Baldwin, shoving closer to Tim.

"It's as true as Gospel," said Tim, mounting a chair, and waving his long arms wildly. "I just come from th' widder's cabin, an' I know she's down ter hard pan, 'cause I overheard Tom's 'little one' ask th' Almighty ter send them something to eat. I tell you, when I heard that little thing prayin' fer bread, I felt so mean, I sneaked out without them knowin' I was there, an' hustled down here to tell you all 'bout it. Now boys, you all have got mothers, an' wives, an' children somewhere; if you haint, you may have some day, an' 'sposen' it was your widder an' little one—well, you'd want some one to give them a 'lift.' Here's a couple of slugs fer th' widder and 'Tom's little one.' Now pards, chip in! chip in!"

And they "chipped in" with a will, and the hat was soon filled with slugs and nuggets; more than one pair of scales were suddenly whipped out of a miner's pocket, and a handful of dust weighed out. "What's up?" inquired new-comers.

Tim told the story again, adding, "It's a shame, pards, that Tom's widder an' 'little one' haint got th' comforts of life."

"How much is there?" said Jack Baldwin, and he began weighing out the nuggets. "Twenty-five hundred. That ain't so bad, boys, fer th' widder. This is better than card-playin' to-night."

"Peers ter me it ought to be an even three thousand," said some one.

"It's pretty good as it is, but I'll put in twenty-five hundred, making it an' even five thousand," said Tim, pulling off his belt and counting out the shining gold slugs. This brought such a shout from the crowd, that Tim felt very important.

"Seem' th' widder is sick, I reckon we'd better take along a basket of grub," said Tim, as he put the gold into a bag. "I don't know much 'bout such things, but it seems to me th' 'little one' will need a frock or two, an' some shoes. An' it might be a good thing ter take th' widder some wood, seein' it's so cold. I reckon th' widder will be mighty glad of th' 'lift.' I haint got much of an education, but p'raps some of you boys will write a letter an' just say, 'God sent them to little Mary.' He put it in our hearts to do it."

Baldwin wrote the letter, and Tim put it on top of the gold, so the "widder" would see it the first thing in opening the bag.

Then Tim and a half a dozen of the boys started out to get what they thought Sally needed most. A barrel of flour, groceries, meat, a load of wood, all sawed and split, some pretty new dresses, and a big bag of candy for "Tom's little one."

The wind roared so that the boys were sure the "widder" wouldn't hear them, as they crept noiselessly into the little shed at the rear of the cabin, and piled the stuff where she would see it in the morning.

Then the wood came next. It was a hard matter to get it around; but the boys were in earnest, and it wasn't long before it was all stowed safe and snug in the little shed.

"I reckon the 'widder' will have plenty for awhile," said Tim, as he deposited the last stick on the pile. "I feel a sight better than if I'd struck a claim that paid five hundred dollars to th' pan."

THE LANDLADY'S SON

Set Right by a Boarder.

Most people are creatures of habit. The person who thinks he cannot get along without his morning drink of coffee is pretty hard to convince unless he is treated like Mrs. Clara Hoffman of Portland, Ore., treated her landlady's son. She says, "Having suffered with stomach trouble for several years I determined to discontinue the use of coffee and try Postum Food Coffee."

I carefully followed directions for making and the result was a beverage very pleasing to the taste. I induced my husband to give it a trial and soon noticed the improvement.

He complained of 'heart trouble' but as he drank coffee I felt sure that this was the cause. It proved to be so, for after having used Postum for a short time his 'heart trouble' completely disappeared.

Last year we went East, and while there we boarded with a private family. Our landlady complained of sleeplessness and her son of obstinate stomach trouble. It was a plain case of coffee poisoning in both. Knowing what Postum had done for me I advised her that the son declared he wanted none of that 'weak, watery stuff.' Well I had been making Postum Coffee for myself and husband and next morning I offered him a cup and he drank it not knowing what it was. Well, I said, 'You seem to like Postum after all.' 'What,' he exclaimed, 'that was not Postum, why, that tasted fine. Mother if you learn to make it like this, I will always drink it.' The next morning she watched me and I explained the importance of allowing it to boil long enough. After that we all drank it regularly and our landlady and her son soon began to get well. They continued to use after we returned home and recently wrote me that they are improving daily.

Early the next morning, Tim, under the pretense of getting a "biled shirt" done up, went to see how things were with the "widdier." He waited until he was sure she was up, then he made his way to the door and went in.

"I thought I'd come 'round an' see if you could do a little job fer me," said Tim, sinking into the nearest chair. "You see, I've been ter 'Frisco, an' I got me some fancy shirts. I reckon you will know 'bout how to do them up."

"I fear I can't do them up right away," said Sally. "I have been sick, but if you are in no hurry for them, I will do my best for you as soon as I can."

"O no hurry at all," said Tim.

She came back from the shed, to where she went to put the shirts in the clothes-basket, with a strange light in her eyes.

"Oh, Mr. Harkins, come!" she cried, catching him by the arm, and dragging some one's heart to send them," said Sally, crying with joy, as she untied the packages. She broke down entirely when she opened the bag that held the gold and read the letter.

"Yes, God sent it right down from heaven to little Mary," she said, falling on her knees, and thanking her Heavenly Father with fervent tears of gladness.

It was quite a struggle with Tim to find his handkerchief, and to keep his eyes from too evident need of it. He was rough, and used to seeing hard things, but when Sally asked God to bless the one through whom he had sent relief, the lump in his throat nearly choked him.

As little Mary opened the big box of candy Tim deposited on the chair for her, she said, "Dear me! I never saw such bootiful candy. Dod was awful good to send it to me; wasn't he, Tim?"

"I reckon th' Almighty knows where

"THE LORD SENT THEM, I RECKON," SAID TIM

him to the shed. "Look at all these things! They are not mine. Somebody has made a mistake and left them at the wrong place."

"May be they have, but it seems to me, th' one who left them thar oughter know what he's 'bout. I reckon nobody would be such a fool as to tote a whole lot of things to where they don't belong through this snow."

"But who could have sent them?" asked Sally, looking hard at the wood.

"Th' Lord sent them, I reckon," said Tim, turning his head so she couldn't see his eyes.

"Yes, mamma, Dod sent 'em," said little Mary, dancing about the room with pure delight. "I asked Dod to send us sometin' to eat, Tim, for I's awful hungry. Do please bring 'em in, mamma. I know Dod sent 'em to us by one of his angels. I asked Dod." Tim had hard work to keep the lump down in his throat, as he saw the child's raptures.

"I reckon they are yours, Mrs. Taylor," said Tim, as he brought in the things, and placed them on the kitchen table for Sally to undo them.

"Surely, the Lord must have put it in th' angels air," said Tim, taking the child on his lap and kissing her tenderly.

"I tell you, pards," said Tim, as he related the proceedings to his comrades that night, "it was th' best whoop up Sandy Gulch ever had since th' diggings was discovered. An' I kinder reckon th' Almighty had somethin' to do with it. It was good of the Lord to make use of us rough fellows to answer a little one's prayer; but we're a long way off from bein' angels yet. Guess we'll try to live straight after this."

Tim's visits to the "widdier's" cabin became more frequent now, and early in the spring, Sandy Gulch saw its first wedding, for Sally Taylor became Mrs. Tim Harkins. The miners "whooped it up" in a way that did Tim proud; and the old miners still talk of the "angels," and also of the wedding as being the greatest sight Sandy Gulch ever saw.

Question of the Week

Do excursions, picnics and similar holiday outings, develop a tendency to laxity in the observance of the proprieties, as is sometimes charged, or is it only found in exceptional cases?

"Birds of a Feather Flock Together"

In case the ignorant and uncultured are the majority, any offenses noticed by the minority put them more on their guard, so that they are unusually careful about proprieties, which serves to make them an object lesson to the majority. If the majority are refined, the few who may be coarse are hushed into a respectful state of mind, when they may take most wholesome lessons by observation. In general, "Birds of a feather flock together," and conform to the ideals of the whole flock. A lady will be a lady under all circumstances. A gentleman will never forget that he is a gentleman. Sunday excursions, picnics and outings have a positive and certain tendency to weaken one's conceptions of duty in regard to Sabbath observance. C. M. S.

Dangerous to Morals

Excursions are promiscuous; and at the seashore, the scramble for bath-rooms and suits, is often the occasion of objectionable scenes, making the modest blush. Flirtations often occur; some end in engagements, for convenience and a snap of the thread when the season is over. Like birds, each is trying unused powers. The Saturday night hop, gives innumerable opportunities for frivolities and absolute heartlessness. The watchmen on the beaches can tell stories the waves would gladly wash away. EMMA B. FENIMORE.

Sunday Excursions Condemned

The Sunday excursions, and the picnic where questionable companions, intoxicating drinks, dancing, and carousing are a regular part of the day's amusement, are unquestionably wrong. But this does not hold true in relation to family, neighborhood, or Sunday School outings under the supervision of upright, and Christian people. The old adage of Poor Tray being found in bad company, is invariably applicable to those instances where any laxity in the observance of the proprieties occur. A day's excursion in good company is as harmless a recreation as we can enjoy. ALICE C. BOYNTON.

Why Improproprieties Occur

It is difficult to believe that excursions, picnics and holiday outings, tend more than other forms of social intercourse towards impropriety of behavior. Such improprieties occur among persons who have an inclination, natural or acquired, in that direction. If such an inclination exists, times, places and opportunities will be found for gratifying it. Indeed, the picnic or excursion, where a considerable number of people are assembled, is not a favorable occasion for improper conduct. That always seeks seclusion. J. G. OSBORNE.

They Lower the Standard

They certainly do, as statistics of immorality prove. A crowd has an unrefining influence; and the moral tone of the ordinary boy or girl—the one who would find amusement in an excursion or a promiscuous picnic—is usually lowered several degrees upon such occasions. It is best, then, to specially guard against familiarity of the sexes, which at all times should be controlled by seniors, unless the young people are extraordinarily strong and sensible. It is a matter of great regret in these days, that holiday outings and camping parties of young people are attended by increasing laxity, and not by a growing love and knowledge of nature. MARION HORSFORD.

Recreation a Universal Necessity

The outing, picnic, etc., is a very good way of getting near to nature, however it may be abused by people carrying their stiff formalities even to such places, making themselves and every one near them uncomfortable. The relaxation from every-day cares and responsibilities is not only beneficial, but necessary. No one can get on without some kind of recreation, in whatever form it may be, and the "laxity" displayed is one way, and a very good one too, by which we enjoy ourselves as children do, which, at bottom, is the only enjoyment worth anything: the opening of the mind and heart, the giving up of oneself with abandon to some harmless amusement as children do; and we are all like children more or less. While the holiday or outing may tend to promote laxity in the observance of the proprieties, it is a safety valve by which many evils escape, and a great many things which are considered improprieties at such places are not such in fact, but, being accustomed to strict formalities and customs, we are sometimes fain to look askance at many things which are innocent amusements. The people who carry things to extremes at picnics or other outings, are those who, in the great majority of cases, would act just the same, or worse, wherever they might be. They are people for whom the outing or picnic is only an opportunity, an excuse, to display their evil tendencies, and who would make the opportunity did it not present itself. M. L. GOSS.

Improprieties are the Exception

It does not necessarily develop such a tendency. It depends on the disposition of the parties. Such gatherings bring people into better acquaintance with one another. This may tend to laxity in the observance of the proprieties with those who overestimate themselves and lightly esteem others, and those who are inclined to be rude and desire to be free from their restraint. But those who have a proper respect for themselves and for others will be more inclined to observe them. OLIVER HEMSTREET.

Mixed Gatherings and their results

Wholesome amusements are necessary for the physical and mental well-being of humanity. It is better that a large number of persons should occasionally be thrown together than for them to divide up into small parties, those in each company seeking their own pleasure in a selfish way, with no opportunity to study people in their hours of relaxation, nor to influence for good some one in need of moral support. Indeed, this very crowding together of many persons of diverse charac-

Pleasant Way to Drive Away the Blues.

A food that will bring back health and rosy cheeks to the sick as well as please the palate of the healthy is a pretty good food to know about. A lady in Minneapolis says, "I am such an enthusiast upon the subject of Grape-Nuts that I want to state a few instances of its value that have come under my personal experience."

I was taken ill with a serious stomach trouble, so ill that the slightest movement caused me pain and could take nothing into my stomach or retain even medicine or water. I had been two days without nourishment when my husband suggested trying Grape-Nuts.

The nurse prepared some with warm water, sugar and cream and I took it hesitatingly at first until I found it caused me no pain and for ten days I took no other nourishment. The doctor was surprised at my improvement and did not resent my attributing the speedy cure to the virtues of Grape-Nuts. He said he had a case on record of a teething baby who grew rosy and fat on the same diet.

Grape-Nuts are so dainty and delicious that it appeals to the whole household and when either husband or I feel generally out of sorts we try confining ourselves exclusively to the food for a day or two with the happiest results.

For a year I have had for a neighbor a delicate girl—an epileptic—when I first knew her she was a mere shadow weighing 70 lbs. and subject to fearful attacks, having as many as 12 and 16 convulsion in a day. At such times she took no nourishment whatever. She had never tried Grape-Nuts and as any food seemed to increase her trouble at such times it was with difficulty I persuaded her to try it. But I told her of my experience and induced her to try a few spoonfuls.

The taste delighted her and ever since she has made it her chief article of diet. The result has been wonderful; her improvement is the subject of remark with all who know her. The attacks are less frequent and violent and she has gained 20 lbs. since last November and her family attribute her improvement solely to Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

teristics has a marked effect in the maintenance of a proper observance of the proprieties, since there will always be in attendance at such gatherings persons of high morality, whose presence will act as a check to undue coarseness on the part of others less refined. If any large assembly of people were broken up into small parties, it is more than probable that "birds of a feather would flock together," with the result that those of low morality would sink still lower, undeterred by the influence of the better class, who would comfort themselves with propriety in any case. It is understood, of course, that these holiday gatherings are not composed entirely of persons of the coarsest fibre, but that they are made up of the common run of people, who are pretty nearly the same the world over.

A. L. VERMILYEA.

They are Innocent, as a Rule

It seems strange, indeed, if one cannot go to a picnic or on some holiday outing, and still remain just as much of a lady or gentleman as if they had remained at home. Is it not right that one should have a little rest, a little pleasure, after the year's work, without some one criticising? We sometimes think that those who criticise every little thing that is said or done, are themselves deepest in the mire. But there is no such tendency. Have we not been there? Can we not speak from experience? Most truthfully we can say that at all the picnics and other outings we have ever gone to, we have never seen or heard anything but what was perfectly right and proper in the sight of God. MRS. J. C. P.

Due to Cosmopolitanism

I think it is found so only in exceptional cases. The so-called freedom of picnics, excursions, etc., is only the manifestation of the cosmopolitanism of a free democracy, and really only extends a friendly and social hand to companionship as a whole, in the same way as we see it manifest at the seashore and like resorts of pleasure, and is, I think, if rightly viewed, only a good indication of advances in social equality, and is likewise an omen of success in further eliminating class distinction, and the upbuilding of a people and nation of an entirely homogeneous whole. WM. W. CASE.

Relaxation not to be Condemned

The conventionalities of life are sometimes decried as making one unreal, insincere and mere tools of fashion, binding one hand and foot, so that when one relaxes this watchfulness of action and throws off restraint like a garment, our acquaintances are amazed at the real self exhibited. And it is a notorious fact that lovers are much bolder when in the swing at a picnic; sweethearts allow themselves more adoring glances when on an excursion than they would venture at other times. Anything that stirs the emotions makes one lax in the proprieties; but does it follow that there will be any moral laxity? Is it not a pleasure to see our minister take off coat and collar, and join in the children's games? The harness of "proprieties" is right; but must not the horse be freed occasionally and permitted to frisk like the colt?

Who shall Draw the Line?

That's just what they are for—a breaking away from constraint, of rules, or methods of conventional "proprieties"—to unhinge the knee of household restraint and social etiquette. "Proprieties" of what, and in what? Who's to judge? Who shall draw the line to the outer wall? Who shall define what constitutes a departure from the moral code? Who shall dissect a thought from its incident? "Observance of proprieties" is the corollary of good behavior, and this may go to excessive hilarity, the exercise of which is a shock to some senses and sensibilities. It may not be good behavior, yet it may not be a breach of "proprieties." It depends on motive and act, and the transgressor of these natural impulses violates no rule in the excessive indulgence of a free, bounding, happy-go-well nature. It's just as we look at things—many see through a glass darkly. 'Tis their nature to. The occasion must not be overlooked. Loosen the cage door, for the long-imprisoned bird. It may not know, or see any difference in the cage, but let it out, that it may know the use of its wings. Its freedom fairly makes it act foolishly. Its very nature, and the elements lift it in bewildering freedom and unrestraint to "take wings and fly away." OLIVER M. WILSON.

Miscellaneous Questions

In a letter from Rev. M. Leflamme, a mission worker in India, to Mr. M. E. Cole of New York, the former refers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in these words:

No paper is more welcomed by the Hindu. It is the paper that sent two and a quarter millions of rupees in cash to help the famine sufferers, and they want to see and read it. A leading lawyer in the town, who had been getting it, was deeply impressed by the spirit of the Christians in the China massacres (as told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), and the story of the murdered missionary's child, who sent famine help to the very people who had murdered the father. "Oh," he said, "where could a more beautiful exposition of the spirit of Christ be seen than in the fine forgiveness and charity of that lad." There shall not one paper be lost that is sent here.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. Can a person be a Christian, and refuse, or neglect to make restitution for wrongs done, when such restitution can be made?

We cannot arrogate to ourselves the right of saying that such a man is not a Christian; but he certainly appears to us to be an inconsistent Christian. We have the right to question whether repentance for a wrong done can be genuine, if the wrongdoer has the means of making restitution, and neglects to do so. Mr. Moody used to tell the story of a man who, while in the employ of a sick man, drank a few bottles of rare wine. The sin troubled his conscience for years, and he could get no peace. He could not bear to tell the man who owned the wine what he had done. He proposed to give twice the value of the wine to God's cause, but Mr. Moody assured him that he could not get peace in that way. Finally, driven by his conscience, he went to the man whose wine he had used, and confessed his sin and paid for the wine. Not until then did he lose the burden.

A. C. B., Fruitport, Calif. Should believers associate with unbelievers, visiting at their homes, and receiving Theosophists, Christian Scientists and infidels into the Christian family circle?

See II. Cor. 6: 14; Heb. 3: 12; Acts 14: 2; II. Peter 2: 1, 2; also Ch. 3: 3, 17. It is not intended, however, that the believer should hold no communication with those who are still in the darkness of unbelief, otherwise he would not be fulfilling the divine command to spread the Gospel, and "show forth Christ," at all seasons. He should, however, avoid all such associations and relationships—business, social and otherwise—as would bring a discordant element into his own home or business life, and thus antagonize spiritual growth. To put such people on the level of home acquaintances and intimate friends, would be very likely to prove spiritually disastrous to some member of your household.

A. L. H., Cardiff, Md. 1. The middle verse of the Bible is Psalm 118: 8. The middle verse of the Old Testament is II. Chron. 20: 13. The middle verse of the New Testament is Acts 17: 17. 2. Your question as to the substitution of a Children's Day service for the regular service, is one to be decided by the church itself. Many churches now make the substitution.

Reader, Montour, Ia. 1. Imaginary, as nearly all stories are. 2. It depends on the point of view. Reader, Asbury Park, N. J. If she is entitled to the pension, and has need of the money, she is quite justified in taking it.

Mr. John B. Wood, founder of El Faro Cristiano Mission at Aguacate, Cuba, has now eight workers in the field.

Prayerful Reader, Watertown, Pa. Why not prevail upon him to sign the pledge? If he loves you he will consent, and will keep it. Get him interested in church temperance work, pray for and with him and you will win him over.

Inquirer. Palmistry is classed with astrology, necromancy and other occult forms of divination or fortune-telling that are denounced in Scripture. See Deut. 18: 11, 12; Isa. 47: 12-14; Jer. 27: 9, 10 and 29: 8, 9, and many similar passages.

READY FOR HIS COMING*

How Christ Would Regard the Condition of the Church and the World if He Came Now

HOW much more important a place the expectation of Christ's coming occupied in the thoughts and lives of the early Christians than it occupies in those of to-day. Few reason as the Apostle did, that his coming must be nearer than it was. It is the inevitable result of the centuries of delay, that men should think that it never will occur. Time after time, with every generation, watching Christians have thought that the condition of the world corresponded with the condition which Christ sketched, as being that immediately preceding his coming. He has been longingly expected, but the signs were misread, and his people have been disappointed; so that now the very attitude which Peter foresaw and described (II. Peter 3: 4), has been taken even by professing Christians. Men ask: "Where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were." Yet, that very attitude is one of the signs of his approach. He himself said that he would come at an hour when he was not expected. But in Apostolic days the expectation was continuous. Believers never parted from one another without reference to the possibility that the Lord would come before they met again and, as we learn from Paul's letter to the Thessalonians, the bitterness of bereavement was rendered more acute by the apprehension that their dead friends would miss the glory of his appearance. Paul removed that fear, but the disappointment continued until gradually men ceased to expect their Lord.

How large is the opportunity of service which would have been missed if Christ had come in those early days! The history of the church has been a checkered one, marked by relapses and periods of indifference and worldliness, but the trend has been upward all the time. Gradually and at long intervals, the church has awakened to the consciousness of some neglected duty and has set itself to its performance. The organization of Sunday Schools, the development of foreign missions, the rise and spread of the young people's movement, have all come within little more than a century. The crude beliefs of the early Christians have been corrected and brought more into the line of Christ's own teaching. Above all, the spirit of Christ has been better understood by each succeeding generation. Time was when persecution and violent deaths were the penalties of differences of faith. Catholic burned Protestant, and when the Protestants gained ascendancy they persecuted the Catholic, and none remembered Christ's reproof of his disciples for wanting to call down fire from heaven on the unbelievers. The church is still worldly, and there are many things in it that Christ surely condemns; but there never was a time when the nucleus, or the remnant, as the prophets called it, was more in earnest in its endeavor to know Christ, to understand his will, and to reach the ideal he set before his church. Progress has been slow and much remains still to be done; but Christianity has been gaining power all the time and increasing in influence over the world, and not only in numbers but in eminence the followers of Christ have increased and multiplied.

We are not, however, ready for Christ's coming. Whether he will come while we are still unready, or will wait for a better condition, is a question on which prophetic expositors are not agreed. There can be no doubt, however, as to our duty, whichever theory we adopt. If he were to come now, we can imagine that he would be pleased with the sincere efforts being made to extend the boundaries of his kingdom. The self-denying, self-sacrificing missionaries, and those who give up luxuries to support them, would surely have his blessing. The people who honestly, though sometimes mistakenly, strive to model their lives by his principles, would receive his kindly benediction. But what would he say to the condition of the world? Has the church done all it has the power to do to solve the problem of poverty, and the vice which is its offspring? Has it exerted all the power it has to prevent war, and to insist on international righteousness? Are all the people who call themselves by his name living as lights in the world? There is much ground still to be possessed before we can say "Thine is the Kingdom." It may be that only under his personal leadership can the victory be won, but we would like that when he does appear, all that we can personally accomplish shall have been done. Only so can we welcome him with joy, and stand among those whom he will greet with, "Well done, good and faithful servants."

Soul-Winners in the Mountains

THE work of the "Society of Soul-Winners" continues to increase in breadth and effectiveness. Readers of this paper are familiar with the history of this society, which came into existence in 1897, when a company of Christian men and women in Kentucky organized a band for conducting evangelical work among the mountain-dwellers of the Appalachian range.

They began with one missionary; they now have sixty laboring in the vast mountain regions of North Carolina, Tennessee and Kentucky. During the past year, they taught over fifty day and Sabbath schools, built seven new churches and a number of mission houses, distributed thousands of Bibles, tracts and religious publications, visited the sick, fed the hungry, and clothed the naked. They have led hundreds of souls to Christ, and preached the Gospel to tens of thousands of the poor. These mountaineers are not a degenerate people, who do not want the Gospel, but a pure stock of Anglo-Saxon and Scotch-Irish, over two millions of whom inhabit a region of mountains as large as the German Empire. Their ancestry, traditions, history, religion, country, language and their very names, the same as ours, yet thousands of them have no church of any kind.

The work of the society has been done at small outlay, $5,430.11 covering the year's expense account. The missionaries, asking only their bare living, have labored cheerfully for the Master in regions beyond churches and schools, beyond roads and rivers—in large sections of the mountains where they are now the only heralds of the Cross. No collections have been taken up for them in large city churches, and no special efforts made to raise means beyond occasional publication of facts. Contributions to carry on the work have come for the most part in small sums from friends not rich in this world's goods. The organization is undenominational. The president is Rev. Dr. E. O. Guerrant, Wilmore, Ky.

September 30

Young men, are you satisfied with your present position and income, or would you like to know more, be more important in the world's work and make more money? This is an age of specialists. Take up some special study and master it; then the world will pay well for your services. Perhaps you are tied down by circumstances, and cannot spare the time or money necessary to go to a technical training-school—then let the school come to you. The study room is your own home. The study hours are whatever time you can give to it. Your lesson papers are examined and corrected by college professors, and everything is made clear, interesting and easy. If you act quickly you can take advantage of our correspondence course and secure a technical education for almost nothing. By vote of the Trustees of the American School of Correspondence we have for some time been issuing to deserving young men a limited number of

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS.

These scholarships provide a full technical education in Electrical, Mechanical, Locomotive, Marine and Stationary Engineering, Heating, Plumbing and Ventilation—without charge for tuition. Of course no institution could be expected to continue such an offer indefinitely; we therefore announce that this offer will be Withdrawn September 30th.

Applications for scholarships postmarked later than September 30th can be accepted only at regular fees ($50.00). Students awarded scholarships will be expected to bear the expense of postage and text-books. Full instruction given in Mechanical Drawing with each course. Examination credits count toward Degree in resident technical school.

For Information and Handbook giving Courses, Methods, Terms, etc., address the Registrar. AMERICAN SCHOOL OF CORRESPONDENCE, BOSTON, MASS.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Through the Feet.

A Common-Sense Method of Treating Rheumatism Without Medicine—Relief Immediate.

The Makers of Magic Foot Drafts want the name and address of every one who has Rheumatism.

Send us your name and we will send a trial pair of drafts to you—on approval—without a cent, in advance.

If you are satisfied with the relief and comfort they give you, then send us One Dollar. If not, don't send us a cent.

The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet, without the least inconvenience, drawing out and absorbing the poisonous acids in the blood. They also exercise a gentle counter-irritant effect, soothing and healing the pain in every part of the body.

Isn't it worth your while to try a pair, since it doesn't cost anything?

Send us your name to-day—we'll send you the drafts by return mail, and will also send a valuable booklet about Rheumatism—free.

CHRIST IN THE TYPES

The Old Testament full of intimations of Him

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE expectation of One that should come as man's deliverer from the power of the enemy runs all through Old Testament Scripture. No sooner did man fall than God spoke of the woman's Seed which should bruise the serpent's head (Gen. 3: 15). The coming of Shiloh, the sent One, is foretold (Gen. 49: 10). The false prophet Balaam spoke of him as of a Star and a Sceptre, which should rise out of Israel (Num. 24: 17). But Moses is the first to speak of him as the Prophet; and it is as such that the people of Israel were looking for him, as well as in the character of King. "Art thou that Prophet?" they asked of John the Baptist (John 1: 21). "This is of a truth that Prophet which should come into the world," they said, when they saw the miracle of the loaves (John 4: 14). And John the Baptist sent two of his disciples to ask Jesus the question, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" (Matt. 11: 3).

"The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, like unto me; unto him shall ye hearken" (Deut. 18: 15). In what did the Lord Jesus resemble Moses? He was born for his work (Heb. 10: 5-7), and was pleasing to God as a new-born babe (Luke 2: 14), just as Moses when he was born was "fair to God" (Acts 7: 20, margin). "He, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor" (II. Cor. 8: 9). He "emptied himself and took on him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2: 7, R.V.) as Moses, "when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt" (Heb. 11: 24-26).

He, as Man, "learned obedience by the things which he suffered" (Heb. 5: 8), as did Moses in his severe schooling in Midian, and in the desert. He came as the Deliverer from sin and death, as Moses was the deliverer from Egyptian bondage. He was the Man who was "meek and lowly in heart" (Matt. 11: 29) as Moses was the meekest man upon the face of the earth (Num. 12: 3). The Lord refused to be made a king (John 6: 15) until he had first suffered. Moses twice refused, even at God's hand, to be exalted at the expense of his brethren (Exod. 32: 10-15; Num. 14: 11-19). The Lord Jesus was "made a curse for us" (Gal. 3: 13); Moses was ready to be blotted out of God's book to obtain pardon for his guilty people (Exod. 32: 32). The Lord Jesus was, for three and a-half years, always accompanied by disciples who were "slow of heart to believe," and whose presence, especially that of Judas, must have been a continual test of patience and of love. Moses, for forty years, wandered with the children of Israel in the wilderness, held back by their sin. Christ was like Moses in his life of prayer and continual dependence upon God.

And now comes a very important difference. Christ could not enter upon his reign on earth as the promised Messiah King, because his own people, the Jews, could not accept the laws and principles of his kingdom as given in Matt. 5-7, nor yet the personality of a king who came in lowliness; being among men "as he that serveth." For the sin of his people, he could not inherit the land at that time. Moses, on the contrary, forfeited his right to enter into the promised land through, his own sin, in striking the rock in anger when God had commanded him to speak to the rock. "That Rock was Christ," we are told (I. Cor. 10: 4). Moses, as the representative of the law, had struck the rock (Exod. 17: 6), and the living water flowed out from the smitten rock for the people, and now living water flows for the world's healing. To strike the Rock a second time was unbelief. Moses, perhaps did not know what he had done, but he knew he was disobedient, and for this sin he might not then enter the land of promise. Now, Christ, as the once smitten Rock, cannot be smitten again. Only speak to him, fainting soul, and the water flows.

To All Who Suffer from SPINAL DEFORMITIES

85 per cent. cheaper than the old methods. 100 per cent. better. Weighs ounces where others weigh pounds. For Men, Women and Children; none too young, none too old to be relieved. We offer the only Scientific Appliance ever invented for the relief of this unsightly condition; relieved the inventor, Mr. P. B. Sheldon, of curvature of the spine of thirty years' standing.

Throw Away the Cumbersome and Costly Plaster-of-Paris and Sole-Leather Jackets

Our appliance is light in weight, durable, and conforms to the body as not to evidence that a support is worn. It is constructed on strictly scientific anatomical principles, and is truly a godsend to all sufferers from spinal troubles, male or female. We also make Scientific Appliances for protruding abdomen, weak back, stooping shoulders. Send for free booklet and letters from physicians, physical instructors, and those who know from experience of our wonderful appliances. SATISFACTION GUARANTEED. Write today for measurement blank. Don't wait.

WESLEYVILLE, PA. I am permanently relieved of a weak and deformed spine, by the use of the Philadelphia Company's Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches and in eight months from the time I first commenced the use of the brace, I could do as much work as any able-bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and in doing so, some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliance. They are so light and comfortable (and can be removed easily) that it is almost a pleasure to wear one.

Mr. List writes the above after 6 years' experience with our appliance. The latter 2 years of which he has not worn any brace or support. PHILADELPHIA BRACE CO., 30-34th St., JAMESTOWN, N.Y.

Miscellaneous Questions

C. A. W., Ashland, O. Is it right to give money towards the upbuilding of God's cause in memory of a dear friend? Is it right to build edifices for sacred worship, or educate a boy or girl in memory of another?

There is probably no more beautiful or permanent way of testifying to our love and esteem for the dear one gone, than to establish some memorial that will have a practical Christian value. We have abundant illustration of this in the endowment of memorial beds at our Mont-Lawn Children's Home; in the support of India orphans, in memory of a son, daughter, parent, or friend, or in the exclusive support of some missionary in a heathen land. These are better memorials than the building of costly and showy edifices.

T. J. F., Oakland, Tenn. Give the number of languages and dialects in which the Bible is printed.

The Bible has been translated into over three hundred languages and dialects, most of this work having been accomplished in less than a century. The American Bible Society, Bible House, New York, issued as a souvenir of the Columbian Exposition, an interesting booklet, giving specimens of 242 of these, which can be had for a nominal sum on application.

Reader, Richmond, Va. When was the first electric telegraph communication made between Baltimore and Washington, D.C.

May 27, 1844. The message was "What hath God wrought," and the sender was a young girl of seventeen, Annie Elsworth, daughter of the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, Henry Leavett Elsworth, the "Father of the Patent Office." The bill to construct a trial line had been pushed through Congress by his efforts, after the inventor, Professor Morse, had given up in despair. When success crowned his endeavors, he sent his daughter to his friend, as bearer of the good might be old-fashioned or otherwise unsalable. There certainly are instances in which the producer is the sufferer, and in those it might become a matter of principle not to deal at a store, the proprietor of which made it a practice to cut down wages, in order that he might offer goods below the market rate. The persistent habit of the public to seek bargains, prompts unscrupulous tradesmen to do this, and so the poorest part of the community suffers.

C. J. H., Woodstock, Conn. Will you inform me if it is anywhere stated in the Bible that the angels wear crowns on their heads? Paul speaks about the "Crown of righteousness," but what about the angels?

Nowhere in the Scriptures are angels represented as wearing crowns. The passage in Rev. 4: 4 is interpreted as referring not to angels, but to the heads of the Old and New Testament Churches—the "elders" in the ministry.

H. F., Fortsville, Grand Bassa, Africa. 1. How many colored people are there in the United States? 2. How many colored people are in the Government Department at Washington, D.C., and what is the average salary per year?

Your letter was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D.C., who answers: 1. Number of colored people (negroes and of negro descent) according to United States Census of 1900, 8,840,789. 2. Number of col-civil list who do service for the Government, and by paying for supplies as they may be furnished for Government use. Second, coin is put into circulation by banks, which receive it from the Government in exchange for gold notes. The Government has to keep on hand a large supply of coin to redeem notes, when requested to do so by their holders. Third, the Government gives coin in exchange for good bullion to the owners of such bullion, when it is presented at the various mints and assay offices in different parts of the United States—at New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, San Francisco, Denver, Helena, Boise, Charlotte, Deadwood and Seattle. The surplus is turned into the Treasury at Washington, as part of the assets of the Government.

A. M. A., Louisville, Ky. Kindly state the origin of the expression, "Curiosity killed a cat."

The original form of the expression is, "Care killed the cat," and the meaning seems to be this: A cat is so tenacious of life and has such powers of endurance that it is said to have "nine lives;" yet "care" killed them all, so destructive a force is care. The author of the maxim is not given; it is a very old one.

Mrs. A., Newark, N. J. What are the best arguments to be used in appealing to a Christian Congregation, mainly poor, to take a personal interest in missionary work?

1. Ask them to do so for the sake of Him whose followers they are. 2. Tell them that not the size or volume of their gifts, but the free and generous spirit in which they are given is most regarded, and that the richest blessings come to the "liberal heart." 3. As they may feel sensitive about small offerings, tell them this anecdote which Dr. Torrey told his Australian audiences: "There was a college professor whose name was Little, and he was a little man, and he had a little wife, and fifteen little children. And he had a little salary. One day a man asked the professor how, when he was so little, his wife so little, and there were so many little Littles, and he had such a little salary, he got along so well? 'Every Little helps,' he replied."

R. L. C., Atlantic City, N. J. Are the methods of electing Bishops the same in the Church of England as in the Protestant Episcopal Church? Also the clergy?

No, the Bishops in England are nominally appointed by the monarch. They are not elected. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister at the time a vacancy occurs, selects the new Bishop. Probably, if the King expressed a strong wish in the matter, his preference might be regarded; but the right of appointment by long usage is vested in the Premier, and is occasionally contrary to the wish both of the bishops and clergy. The appointments of the clergy are of different kinds. In some instances, one of the universities appoints the clergyman when a living falls vacant. In others, the representative of the man who founded the church many years ago. In still other cases, the right of appointment, like that of the bishops, is vested in the Premier, nominally of the crown.

Mrs. P. Kittinger, Caledonia, Kan., writes that many farmers in that part of the State are in need of help, and would gladly hire men at good wages.

Miss Emily McM., Signal, O. There are many parts of New York City where the children are long distances from the parks. The tenements are chiefly along the east and west sides, the downtown east side being the most densely populated. There is more misery and distress at all times among the New York poor than could possibly exist in other cities.

Effie Y., Middletown, O. All the denominations named hold the same essentials of the Christian faith in common. The principal differences are those relating to church government and ceremonial forms.

Jno. H., Harrisville, Pa. Scientists can only conjecture as to the changes in the earth's axis during past ages. That there were such changes is conceded, but as to the time or number none can speak positively, as the earth's age is not known, even approximately.

Who Holds the Longest Record of Continuous Church Attendance?

A READER of this paper has sent us the following, with a request for publication:

NEW YORK CITY, Aug.

Dear Editor:—In our church we have a sprinkling of aged members, who have grown old in the service of Christ, and who have been uninterruptedly attached to the organization through so many successive years, that it might be truthfully said that "the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." At this time I have especially in view Mr. N— O—, who has been a member and regular attendant upon the services in our church (the — M. E., one of the oldest in town), for forty-seven years and four months! Please remember that this is a record of continuous and unbroken attendance and service. We all love and respect this veteran for his admirable Christian character. We should be glad to know if any of your readers, in any State of our Union, knows of any friend or acquaintance whose record of faithful, continuous attendance on the ordinances of God's house is equal to this.

J. A. N.

Forty-seven years and over of unbroken worship in the same church home! We believe, however, that there are among our readers, or in their circle of acquaintance, many godly men and women with equally wonderful records. We invite them to send in the names of those aged Christians of their acquaintance, who have the longest record of continuous church connection and attendance. Their experience will act as a spiritual tonic and inspiration to the Church at large. Send the essential facts, names and dates. All will be published in an early issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

AUSTRALIA'S PENTECOSTAL WAVE

A Revival Sweeps the Southern Continent, Bringing Multitudes into the Kingdom — 6,000 Confess Christ at One Meeting

WHILE the various Protestant Churches in the United States have been planning, praying and hoping for a revival of religion in which many souls might be swept into the kingdom, and Christ's church on earth greatly augmented, the spiritual fire has been kindled in a distant and altogether unexpected quarter of the globe. Australia is at the present time experiencing the grandest revival it has ever known. Some hints of what is happening there have come to us, in letters and brief dispatches, but the reality is far beyond what any one here could have conjectured. As early as March last, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD made mention of the first tokens of the coming blessing, for which Australia had been hungering and praying. It has now come. It is a vast Pentecostal wave, which has stirred the great southern continent to its very centre. Great multitudes have been brought into the Kingdom within a very brief period, and the marvelous work, under God's blessing, continues. At a meeting in Melbourne, where the audience numbered over eight thousand, more than six thousand rose and publicly declared they had given themselves to Christ during the series of meetings. It would be difficult in the whole history of Christian effort to find a scene or a declaration more remarkable than this.

Australia's new spiritual campaign was planned when the Evangelization Society of Australasia, some years ago, invited Mr. D. L. Moody to visit that country and undertake the work. After the death of the great evangelist, an invitation to visit for the American to gather the harvest, where others had planted and watered. From the first, Dr. Torrey acted in co-operation with the Simultaneous Mission of Melbourne. Two thousand preparatory prayer-meetings were held in different parts of the country during the first eight weeks. Then, after careful organization, fifty meetings were held in and around Melbourne, in churches, halls, parks and on the streets, all the leading pastors and evangelists co-operating. At the principal meetings Dr. Torrey was the chief speaker.

The Rev. Wm. E. Geil, of Doylestown, Pa. (who several years ago contributed a series of letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the Holy Land), also took a prominent part, and Mr. Charles Alexander, a well-known American singing evangelist, led the great audiences in the hymn service. A large number of Australian pastors and laymen also shared in the labors of this great movement and rejoiced in the spiritual outcome. The Rev. S. Pearce Carey, M.A., a grandson of Carey, the pioneer missionary of India, was one of the workers. Among them were Anglicans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, Brethren and Salvationists.

Among the first fruits of the revival were between two and three thousand converts, who were brought to Christ in Sydney. Adelaide also felt the Pentecostal shower in liberal measure. All sorts and conditions of men were included among the converts—mine managers and miners, workers in every line of trade, business men, and even hardened and desperate

Australia was extended to Prof. R. A. Torrey, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. Last winter he set out on a missionary tour of the globe. Australia was reached early in April, and here began an experience as strange as unforeseen. For years the church in Australia had been praying and working for a revival, and now they were about to witness the fruition of their hopes and their prayers. But it was reserved characters. In almost every place, the largest halls were too small for the vast crowds that were attracted by the preaching of the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ. "Acres of people," as one evangelist expressed it, were frequently turned away. Theatres found themselves bereft of audiences, and for months, amusement and dissipation of all kinds were well nigh forgotten or neglected

Important Preparations

TEXT, Isaiah 38: 1 "Set thine house in order: for thou shalt die."

I AM going to stay aboard this planet as long as I can. When the time comes for me to die I believe sufficient grace will be given to me with which to die; but I have never felt less like dying than at the present time. My home was never so happy; my friends never more kind; my work never more absorbing. Present earthly life is inexpressibly sweet to me. I feel in reference to it a great deal as did Christopher North, the physical and literary athlete, who, with his friends and children, used to race over the heather of old Scotland, his yellow curls a-flying in the winds, singing and shouting as he ran, because he was bubbling over with joy and animal spirits. I am in love with the world because I like the people who are in it.

But though earthly life may be a priceless boon to some people, as well as to myself, yet there must come to all a time when we shall have to die. Perhaps, like Hezekiah of my text, who besought God by prayer to increase his earthly day, we may be able to prolong our existence ten, fifteen, or even twenty years by rigidly obeying the well-tested physical laws of health. Dio Lewis, the great lecturer upon hygiene, once declared that every normal healthy child born into the world ought to live to be at least one hundred years old. He asserted that nearly all the members of the human race do not live out half their earthly life, because they do not eat the right kind of food, wear the proper clothing, and take the proper amount of exercise.

But though the longevity of the human race might be increased to one hundred or even two hundred years; though the present generation might be able to reach the two hundred and fiftieth mile-stone, which marks the highway of life's journey, instead of only the twentieth, or fiftieth, or seventieth mile-stone, yet for every man and woman there must come at last an end to earthly existence. The Bible distinctly and emphatically states it. All history proves it. Though Dio Lewis himself rigidly practiced the laws of health which his keen and far-reaching intellect framed; though he only ate just enough food to replenish the amount of waste tissue; though he wore the proper clothing, and daily took the proper amount of physical exercise, yet Dio Lewis himself had to die. So the same words of warning which the prophet Isaiah brought to the sick ruler in the ancient Jerusalem palace, I bring to you. They are just as pertinent for the present generation as they were to the Hebrew king, who lived nearly three thousand years ago.

Make Your Will

In anticipating his earthly demise, a common-sense man should, in the first place, set his temporal house in order. That means, he should, if necessary, get his life insured. He should make out his last will and testament. He should appoint the executors of his estate, and the future guardian of his children. He should explain the details of his business and invest his moneys in such a manner as that his executors can easily carry out his plans. He should train up his children or his lieutenants so that they may carry on his work after he is dead. He should, if desirable, buy his family-plot and make all arrangements for the last resting-place of himself and his loved ones. We have contempt for the man who has so little interest in the temporal welfare of his wife and children, that he will not make a last will and testament, to decide how his estate is to be divided. We despise the selfishly thoughtless man who will leave his business affairs in one grand, big, inexplicable muddle.

"But, Mr. Talmage," answers some one, "I would do as you say, but I am very superstitious about this matter of making a will. I intend to make a will and fix up my temporal affairs when I feel that my life is drawing to an earthly close; but not now. I have always superstitiously felt that when a man makes his last will and testament, he will certainly die before the year is out. Therefore, I want to postpone making my will as long as possible."

Although, I am, comparatively speaking, a young man, yet I have had a great deal of experience in sick-rooms, and by death-beds, and, my brother, I want to warn you as a friend, that in all probability when you come to die, you will not have any time to fix up your estate and make an intelligent will and last testament. In all probability, you will be in such physical and mental weakness that you will not have enough strength to do anything else but lie in your bed, and murmur a few words of farewell, until you are gone. Therefore, my brother, what you want to do in reference to setting your temporal house in order, through your last will and testament, you had better do right away. When death comes, your brain may be too feeble to plan, and your fingers too trembling to hold a pen.

Furthermore, my friend, that statement of yours about being superstitious in reference to making a will, is very foolish. It is as foolish as the superstitions some people have about sitting one of thirteen at a table, or looking at the new moon over the wrong shoulder, or carrying a new-born babe downstairs before he is carried upstairs. It is so foolish, that I am surprised it should be anywhere entertained among intelligent people. You will not die, because you make your last will and testament; but you ought to make your last will and testament in reference to your temporal affairs, because your death is inevitable. "Set thine house in order."

"But, Mr. Talmage," says some other, "what is the good of my making a last will and testament? I have nothing to leave, except the few clothes in my wardrobe, and there are not many of them. I am a clerk, on a comparatively small salary. I live up to the last cent of my income, and I cannot afford to insure my life for the benefit of my children."

Protect the Loved Ones

My brother that is a very brave and frank statement to make. You say it is useless for you to make a last will and testament, because you have nothing to leave, and you cannot afford to even get your life insured. If you, a great, big, strong man, are having such a hard time to make a living, what will your physically weak wife do, with a big brood of little ones strapped upon her back, when you are dead? If it is so hard for you to swim in the current of life, and keep your head above the waters, how will she, a poor widow, be able to do it, when your strong arm is gone? Will the world be kinder to her than it is to you? Has the cruel world ever been any gentler or extended a more helpful hand to a wife and a mother who is left a poverty-stricken widow, than it has for you?

Mark you: For what most men foolishly squander every year; for the money they spend for cigars and luxuries, for theatre tickets, fishing excursions, and baseball games, clubs, and parties, they could get their lives insured for enough, and more than enough, to support and educate their children long after they are dead. Furthermore, my brother, if you are not willing to economize in your selfish indulgences for the physical maintenance and mental development of your children by insuring your life, then your professed love for your wife and children is a mere insincere profession of the lips, and not of the heart. "Set thine house in order."

"But," I hear some one saying, "the temporal aspects of this text do not affect me at all. I do not have to get my life insured. I am not poor. I am one of the wealthiest merchants of this city. I am building up a fortune, which is growing larger every day. If my wife or children wish to buy anything, all that they have to do is to go down to the city stores and charge the same to me. I pay for all their luxuries without a murmur. Besides that, I have made a last will and testament, and left them everything."

Yes, your statement may be all true. But, my successful merchant friend, have you literally set your temporal house in order? Have you taken your wife into your business confidence, so that she knows your plans and ideas? Have you ever made her your business confidante, so that she would be able to take care of the money and the business after you are dead? Have you taught her the difference between the stability of a government bond and a Wall Street speculation in stocks? Have you ever taught her the necessity of taking a receipt? Why, the wife and the mother of your children may be as helpless as a little child, in reference to business matters, after you are dead. She might be so helpless that the executors could swindle her out of her money as easily as you could cheat in business a five-year-old lad. Leave your wife sense, as well as cents; leave her brains, as well as bonds. "Set thine house in order."

Ruined by Speculation

One of the dearest friends of our family, some years ago, was left a widow with $300,000. Her executor persuaded her to invest the same in railroad stocks, so that she might have a million dollars. She went into Wall street and speculated. To-day she is absolutely penniless. Make no such mistake in reference to your wife as that husband made in reference to his wife, who was our family friend. The old proverb trenchantly teaches that "any fool can make money, but it takes a very wise man to keep it." When you set your temporal house in order, see that your loved ones will be able to care for the money which you will bequeath them. See that the money which you will leave will not be able to slip through their fingers as water through a sieve.

But my text has a wider scope than the mere fixing up of the temporal house. In anticipating his earthly demise, a common-sense man should set his spiritual as well as his temporal house in order. He should prepare for his own eternal journey over the River of Death besides looking after the temporal interests of the members of the household he is going to leave behind. Unless a man has taken a long journey away from home, a journey which runs up into the months and perhaps into the years, he can have no conception of the immense amount of preparation necessary. In the first place, he must get his letter of credit drawn up and signed. It would be practically impossible to start on a journey around the world, as I did some years ago, and carry enough gold and silver with you to pay a your necessary expenses. Why, the gold and silver would be as heavy as a satchelful of lead. Besides, the gold and silver that are stamped in the American mirror would not be acceptable in foreign lands. Every country has its own system of national currency. Further, if a traveler should be weighed down with a satchelful of coin, he would in all probability be waylaid by some thief and murderer and slain for his gold. So it is the custom of the traveler about to start on a long journey to buy a letter of credit. He pays to the cashier of one of our great American banking houses, like Brown Brothers or J. P. Morgan & Co., a certain amount of money. That bank gives him a letter of credit, and he can get the money, noted in the letter of credit, cashed by the agents of that bank in almost every city of the world. If you are going into any dangerous region, it is also very important for you to have a passport. This passport, signed by the Secretary of State at Washington, is a notification that you are an American citizen. If any foreign nation insults or maltreats you, the nation will have to answer for the insult to the United States Government.

Necessaries for the Last Journey

Now, my friend, as you have to take an eternal journey: as, perhaps in the very near future, you will have to leave this old planet and go into the endless life beyond, what spiritual preparation have you made for the momentous embarkation? Have you made the proper spiritual preparation for the journey which shall take you into a country where you would like to live through endless eternity: where you would like to live until time itself shall be no longer? Have you in readiness for this eternal journey a letter of credit made out at the Bank of Divine Grace? Have you an eternal passport written in red ink—written in the blood which flowed out of the wounded side of a dying and an atoning Christ? If you have not such a letter of credit, you are ill-prepared; you are lost indeed, even though in this world you had all the wealth of a Rothschild, a Vanderbilt, a Rockefeller, or an Astor: even though you once on earth lived in as magnificent a mansion as did Dives of old, at whose gate the dogs were licking the sores of a dying beggar. Shrouds have no pockets, and a skeleton's bony fingers can hold no gold and all your worldly riches will then be but dross, which you cannot carry with you on that last journey. But if you have the letter of credit of Divine Grace and the passport stamped with the crimson seal of Calvary, then the long journey will be accomplished safely and the gates of the New Jerusalem will be opened unto you, no matter how financially poor you may have been on earth, because you are pleading there for admittance in Christ's name.

Henry Clews tells us that when old Cornelius Vanderbilt, the richest man of his day, lay dying, turning his back upon his $90,000,000 as though he had been the poorest outcast in the street, he had to ask his Christian wife to pray for him and sing one of the old Christian hymns, which she had learned in her father's house. May we, one and all, never make the mistake the age millionaire made in trying to fix up our divine passport at the last moment. May we, long before our earthly demise, apply at the Bank of Grace for a letter of credit which will successfully carry us through the dark day when we are dying, and be sufficient for us until we realize the bright and triumphant advent of a heavenly welcome.

To further carry out the idea of my text, the true Christian should look after the spiritual interests of his children and loved ones, as well as prepare for his own celestial translation. The homestead is not a hermitage—not a place built where a man or woman or child can live in solitary grandeur. But the house of the text implies the father and the mother, and the children, the brothers and the sisters: the kith and kin and the manly loved ones. All can live together in peace and happiness.

ness within the same four walls. And as all the members of a family dwelling within the same house ought to have a common interest, so you cannot separate your own individual spiritual interests from the spiritual interests of your wife and children and loved ones.

The simile of death as a long journey, away from the family fireside, is very striking. When a man takes a long earthly journey, he is very apt to gather his family about him, and say, "If I should take this journey, in all probability I will return home at such and such a time." Or, if the father is going into a new country, to establish another home, he says to his children, "After I am settled there, and find everything all right; you can sell the goods and pack up and come to me. I will be in such and such a place, at such and such a time." Or, perhaps, the man who is about to take a long journey will do as my father and myself did when we started on our journey around the world. We were to set sail from San Francisco, and go by the way of the Sandwich Islands, Samoa, Australia and India. It was a long, hard journey, and mother was physically unable to undertake it. So father said: "Mother, you take the two girls and go to Europe, and meet Frank and myself, as we come around the world; meet us either at Brindisi, or in Paris, or London." So mother set sail from New York and went East. Father and myself set sail from San Francisco, going West. We were all to meet by a preconceived plan at the French capital.

The Great Meeting-Place

My brother, as you must take this long journey through the valley of the shadow of death, with the divine passport in your hands, how can you ever expect to rejoin your loved ones, unless you make previous arrangements with them where to meet? Having a letter of credit at the Bank of Grace, you say you expect to journey to the Celestial City. Have you ever told your loved ones about that city? Have you ever told them how to get to that centre of the universe? Have you ever told them there is only one way to reach your destination, and that is for them to obtain forgiveness of their sins by the blood of the Lamb, so that their heavenly advent shall be made possible? If it is important for you to make spiritual preparations for the journey of death by being washed in the Saviour's blood, is it not just as important for your loved ones to be cleansed by the same blood?

I would plead with you, men and women who are trying to set your house in order, to look after the spiritual welfare of your loved ones as well as your own, because I do not understand how heaven can ever be a truly and entirely happy place for any man who has neglected to look after the spiritual interests of those who on earth were near and dear to him. I know that the Bible distinctly declares that heaven is to be a bright and a happy place, but for one, I think that even celestial happiness would be marred if, when we are safely there, we were conscious that our loved ones had missed their opportunity of coming in, through our own neglect to tell them the way to the great White Throne. I well remember in our journey around the world, how the heart ached, when in far-off Australia, father and I received a cablegram that mother was sick, and had to return to America, and could not meet us in Paris. I well remember how anxiously we two, twelve thousand miles from home, looked at each other. Then we began to worry about the illness which, some months later, ended my mother's earthly life. And, oh, if we were disappointed by not meeting my mother in the French capital, how much more disappointed will some of us be, when we reach heaven, if we should feel that our brothers and sisters, and husbands and wives, fathers and mothers, and children, should have been in any way prevented joining us in heaven, and especially if the obstacle has been one of our making. For my own part, I can sympathize a great deal with the prayer once made in bitter agony by the bedside of her husband, whom she supposed to be asleep. With the tears raining down her cheeks, she said, "Oh, God, save my husband! Save my dear, dear husband! And if by any means, my own sinful life has made him turn his back upon thee, then blot out my name from the Book of Life, if thou wilt. Only save him!" My brother and sister, preparing for the great and eternal journey beyond the grave, I beg of you at this critical time, to look after the spiritual interests of your loved ones, and those who are near to you.

But there is one overwhelming thought about my text, upon which I love to dwell. If we go to the Throne of Grace in the right spirit of prayer, God will let every one of us live as long as is necessary to do the work he wants us to do in his name. When the prophet Isaiah entered the royal palace of Jerusalem, and said to the sick Hezekiah, "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order for thou shalt die," the king turned his face towards the wall and began to weep. Hezekiah was not weeping because he had to die. He was not afraid to die. But he wept because he could not accomplish for God and his people that which seemed necessary for him to do. Then in answer to Hezekiah's prayer, God said to Isaiah the prophet, "Go and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the Lord the God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer. I have seen thy tears: Behold, I will add unto thy days fifteen years." So to-day, if like Hezekiah, we will pray in the right spirit, God will let most of us live long enough to carry the Gospel message to all of our dear ones, as well as to spiritually prepare for our own eternal journey. But as our earthly time is short, in order to make this spiritual preparation ourselves and to help make the spiritual preparation of our loved ones by bringing them to the Saviour, we must consecrate ourselves to the Lord's service now. By the power of the Holy Spirit, we must consecrate our lives to God's work, as we have never consecrated them before. We must so eat and drink and breathe and talk and pray that we shall make Christ the supreme ruler of our lives, so that in all things we may do nothing inconsistent with our allegiance to him. Are you and I like Hezekiah, ready to surrender our lives entirely to the Divine Master's will?

A Girl's Ordeal

Some of us have seen the noted picture which bears the title "Christ or Diana?" The central figure is a beautiful girl, with one of the sweetest, noblest faces ever painted by an artist's brush. With true dramatic power, the master has surrounded that young girl with all the horrors of a Neronian persecution. There, in the background of the picture, is the amphitheatre in which wild beasts are tearing the martyrs to pieces, and crunching the bones of the slain. There are the torches made out of the living bodies of men and women, covered with pitch, who are dying for their belief in the lowly Nazarene. There are the grim-faced Roman soldiers. There is the pleading lover, as well as the pleading mother and father, begging the young girl to renounce her belief in her Saviour. And there the young maiden stands between the altar of a heathen God and the solemn upright Cross, upon which is hanging the bruised body of a dead Christ.

That picture may be dramatic and powerful, but oh, my brother, there is a truer scene being enacted here to-day. As I speak the words of my text, your own eternal redemption, as well as that of all your loved ones, is pleading with you. They are pleading with you to stop worshipping at the altar of Caesar, which is the altar of sin. They are pleading with you, because if you do not cease to bow before sin's altar, you shall surely die. But if you will, in the few years that are left on earth, bow before the Cross, and accept Christ as your Saviour, you shall eternally live. And if you, here and now, consecrate your life aright, to the Divine Master's service, your loved ones, by hearing the Gospel message from your life, may eternally live also. May the Holy Spirit lead every one of us to make the right preparations for the imminent journey through the dark valley of the shadow of death.

They Adopt an Orphan Asylum for Little John's Sake

ADOPTING a whole orphan asylum at once! This, even in our days of startling philanthropies, is rather apt to take one's breath away. Yet it is exactly what a Michigan farmer and his wife seem to have done.

In "South Haven," the centre of the Michigan "Fruit Belt," live Mr. and Mrs. John Shandrow, on their hundred-acre farm, and with them dwell twenty-one orphan and half-orphan children, every one calling them "Pa" and "Ma." Some eighteen months ago, these little folks were inmates of a Minneapolis home for dependent children. How they came to be members of the Shandrow household is thus related:

Two years ago, the Shandrows lost their only child, a sturdy lad, named for his father. He died a hero's death, for he was in trying to save a young companion from drowning that he sacrificed his own life. "We could never forget little John," says his father. "His ma and I always stand in front of his picture, and think about him awhile every night before we go to bed." They were so lonely that they bethought themselves finally of taking into their hearts and homes, for "little John's sake," some desolate child in need of loving. Last spring, a year ago, they wrote to a friend in Minneapolis, to send out for the summer "a few likely boys" from some orphanage, their purpose being to select the one that pleased them best for adoption. The institution to which the friend applied was neither large nor wealthy. The message was confused in transmission, and the management, acting on what they thought it to be, sent out their entire visible supply of children over three years old, twenty-two in all; and to the astonishment of Farmer Shandrow and his wife, twenty-two girls and boys were unloaded on them at once.

Hospitality was equal to the strain. Mother Shandrow had fed big companies of men at threshing-time, and in the matter of sleeping accommodations, a farmhouse and barn are elastic enough to meet any requirements. The work to be done was lighter than might at first appear—for were there not twenty-two willing pairs of legs to run errands and as many willing little hands to do chores? The children swarmed all over the farm; they helped about things; they played and laughed, and made themselves at home, and in a bunch adopted the Shandrows. All grew brown and strong, except little Jennie who died in the winter.

"I tried to pick out a boy to take the place of John," said Mr. Shandrow, "but it wasn't no use, I wanted one bad as another. We couldn't make up our minds to send any of the children away, so we just kept them." He built a schoolhouse for them and the township supplied a teacher. All the little waifs were enrolled as "Shandrows." In the fall, the neighborhood pastor found out that some of the crowd had not been christened; this was immediately attended to, all the little Shandrows who had been neglected in this particular being baptized at once.

Summer visitors to this part of Michigan are sure to look up the Shandrows' "baby farm" as a point of interest. Some insist on making contributions. But Mr. Shandrow declares that he will apply nothing thus bestowed to the support of the children; he deposits any money given, in a local bank, in his name as trustee, the total to go the children when the time comes for division. His orchards have brought him and his wife a modest competence, which they have not wasted; and they do not seem to feel their large new family as a burden. The lads are learning the profitable secrets of fruit-culture; and the little maids will not lack in skill in any domestic art that Mother Shandrow can teach.

All the Shandrow children are regular attendants at church and Sunday School. The sacred building is at some distance from the farm and they all go in the big wagon, with a double team hitched to it and the roomy hayrack placed on top. The Shandrow family, all in Sunday best, driving to church and walking up the aisle are neighborhood sights worth seeing.

Their religious training is carefully looked after. Every day in the Shandrow home is begun with family prayers. Every night, a white-clad company of the tiniest ones gather about Mother Shandrow's knee to say "Our Father." And "little John's" pictured face looks smilingly down.

How the Central Union Mission is Serving All the States at Their Political Centre

AMONG all the cities of the United States, there is none whose condition concerns so many other communities as does Washington. As the political and executive centre of the country, its population consists of men and women from all the States, drawn thither by office, or the hope of office, and by business with the Departments. The consequence of the fact is, that with the brightest and best of our national life, there is always a residuum of evil, and that men of depraved propensities are to be found there side by side with some of the noblest and wisest American citizens. How to reach these lost specimens of humanity, and rescue them from their degradation, is a problem that has deeply stirred the Christian people of the city. Many methods have been adopted, and among them none have been so successful as those which called into existence the Central Union Mission, and have kept in operation the agencies of rescue work which it has initiated.

A remarkable tribute to the value of its work, and to the success which has attended the efforts of the devoted men who have given time and labor to its work, was paid recently by the Hon. H. B. F. MacFarland, who, as President of the Board of District Commissioners, knows better than any one the effect on the city life of any reforming agency. At a meeting which filled one of the largest auditoriums in Washington to overflowing, he said:

"This city, as a city, owes much to the Central Union Mission, and I am glad, as Washington's official head for the time being, to acknowledge that indebtedness here to-night. It is not inconsistent with my official position to express the appreciation which every right-minded citizen of Washington City must feel for the Central Union Mission as one of the forces which make for civic righteousness as well as a cause of the salvation of the individual. Like the Salvation Army, it reaches out and down for men and women in the lowest social depths, and brings them up to paths of safety, and by efforts of patient Christian love, and with the aid of the power of the Almighty, it stands like a life-saving station in the very centre of the city's tides, and by day and night seeks to rescue perishing souls with all the modern appliances for meeting physical needs, and at the same time with all the spiritual powers of Apostolic Christianity.

"It seems significant to me that its central building is at the foot of Louisiana Avenue hill, on which stands our Police Court building, through which men and women, and even boys and girls, pour daily in misery and degradation to the jail and workhouse. If the Central Union Mission could do this work perfectly, there would be little need of police courts, jails and workhouses. In so far as it succeeds, it saves money—as well as human beings—to the city, and this affords some measurement of its value. But it is not content with doing what it can for the souls of men and women, boys and girls of all classes and degrees, in its own building with its dormitories, its restaurant, its wood-yard, and other opportunities to earn by work a good living, but it goes out in its famous Gospel wagon—a model for other cities—to meet on the streets in different parts of the city, and in its branch Missions stationed all over the town, it reaches many thousands of people who never go to the churches. Those of us who have watched the growth of the Mission since it was founded, can testify that in all these ways it has been a blessing to thousands of people, and through them to the entire city of Washington."

This eloquent tribute is endorsed unanimously by the Christian people of the city. The history of the movement that gave it birth is full of interest. Eighteen years ago, the necessity of an institution for the rescue of the fallen was laid upon the hearts of some Christian men, resulting in the organization and maintenance of a Rescue Mission in the very heart of the city, where Gospel services have been held twice each day in the year during that entire period, and where thousands of men and women, overcome by the power of the tempter, dissipated, discouraged and despairing, have been rescued and saved to lives of usefulness, respectability, virtue and happiness. The Mission has grown in importance and usefulness with the years, and to-day, through its varied agencies, is doing a work of unparalleled extent.

FOUNTAIN AT THE CENTRAL UNION MISSION

The following is a condensed statement of the agencies in active operation by this great organization:

- 1st. Maintaining religious services at mid-day and at 7:30 P.M. every day of the year in the Mission building, 622 Louisiana Avenue.
- 2d. Maintaining six branches in neglected portions of the city, where services are held two to four nights of each week, and at three of which Sunday Schools are conducted.
- 3d. Gospel Wagon services maintained on the streets from May 1 to October 31 of each year.
- 4th. Wood yard in the basement of the building, where indigent men and tramps can work for meals and lodgings.

6th. Dormitories accommodating two hundred, where a good clean bed is furnished for an hour's labor in the wood yard or for ten cents, with a warm bath thrown in. A separate dormitory is provided for homeless women, and work furnished in the laundry.

7th. Temporary relief, consisting of meals and lodgings, furnish-reader any idea of the glad and mighty results of this work, but in round figures about 2,000 religious meetings are held each year with an aggregate attendance of 150,000 persons, over 3,000 requests for prayer, and over 600 conversions from the ranks of those who are given over to sin and vice, many of whom have become earnest, active, and aggressive workers in the Mission and the churches to which they have become attached. Some have entered the ministry, some are evangelists and others successful Superintendents of Rescue Missions.

The following clipping from a recent issue of the Mission Bulletin, a paper published weekly by the Mission, shows the kind of work being done there. The case to which it refers, is a type of multitudes, in which, through God's blessing on the efforts put forth, the wanderer has been restored to his deserted home and family, clothed and in his right mind:

"From Toronto, Canada, a letter was received recently, in which the writer, who had been induced at the Central Union Mission, to trust in Christ for the power to resist the intoxicating cup, describe his welcome home by his family. He says 'Safe at home at last, a better, brighter boy, thanks to God who led me into the Mission. Mother, father, sister and pastor who had never ceased to pray for the restoration of the prodigal, happy to see me home once more. God, helping me, will never wander again. Especially, never wander from God, which I have learned by sad experience, is the beginning of all wanderings.'

There is no State in the Union, and scarcely an European country, that is not indebted to the Central Union Mission for the rescue of one or more of its citizens. Often they are men of whom their native land has reason to be proud, but of whom it is forced to be ashamed. It is the saddest feature of dissipation that it is not content with small prey, but lay its hands on the brightest intellects and the warmest hearts. They sink under its power until they become a curse to themselves and the community. At the Mission they are brought under a stronger power—the power of Him who is mighty to save. Disappointed office-seekers, and men who drift to the city hoping for help from political friends, make up a great army, who by strange perversity drown their disappointments in drink. They come from all quarters, and the vacant places in the ranks of the fallen are quickly filled; but the workers at the Mission never weary and are ever ready for the Christ-like work of rescue. Their chief difficulty is the ever recurring one of the drained treasury. Money is sorely needed for current expenses, and there is a debt on the building of $4,500, which is a heavy burden. The work they are doing for the representatives of all sections of the country gives them a claim of general support. Contributions, however small, would be welcomed, and would be applied to the continuance of effort which are essentially Christ-like.

NEW JERSEY'S CHILD TOILERS

The Sad Little Workers in the Mills, and Their Unnatural Lives

CHILD-WORKERS RETURNING HOME FROM A NEW JERSEY MILL

LITTLE "MILL HANDS" WAITING TO RESUME WORK

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's plea for the little children whom a life of heartless toil robs of their childhood, is already beginning to bear fruit. At a congress of the State Federation of Labor of New Jersey, held last week in Trenton, a resolution was passed calling upon the Governor to remove the State Factory Inspector for failure to abolish child labor. The inspector was called before the congress, and practically admitted that child labor existed in New Jersey, but that he was powerless to stop it.

There are several places in New Jersey where child slavery, in one form or another, exists, but nowhere is the law so flagrantly violated as in Paterson. There the little white slaves endure an existence that is as hopeless and as dismal as that of any child in the coal-breakers or knitting mills of Pennsylvania.

Paterson is within three-quarters of an hour's ride of the city of New York. It is known throughout the United States as the "silk city," almost its entire population—more than one hundred thousand—being more or less dependent upon the mills as a means of livelihood. All over Paterson are large brick buildings, where are employed thousands of workers in the manufacture of silk and hemp products. Paterson has been a silk city for three-quarters of a century, but the weaving and spinning of flax, which began about twenty-five years ago, is beginning to rival it in importance as an industry.

Strikes are frequent and spasmodic in Paterson. Scarcely any two strikes are due to the same direct causes: sometimes it is because of a demand made by the "tossers" on the question of hours; sometimes the weavers are opposed to a five per cent reduction. But behind these direct causes of irritation is a constant disposition on the part of the mill-owners to supplant the labor of men and adult women with young girls and—so the "hands" say—with that of children.

Simultaneously with the formation of unions came the introduction of improved machinery into the mill, which made highly skilled labor less necessary than formerly. The work which had always required the services of an expert weaver can now be performed by a woman, after a very short course of practice in the trade. Women do not belong to the union, they have no walking delegates nor strenuous ideas about "the rights of man;" and as for the rights of woman, well, whatever they may be, they are not enforced by unions, and consequently they do not deserve very serious consideration. Whenever the "hands" struck or "made trouble," the conviction was forced home to the mill-owner that future difficulties could be avoided by having girls take the place of men at the looms. Men weavers and spinners, both in flax and silk, are becoming more and more scarce as the size of the industries increase.

This was the first step. Women in Paterson are paid from seven to ten dollars a week. This is considerably less than what was paid to men; but children can be hired for less than either. And so the child came to be a factor in the mill life of Paterson.

According to the factory laws of the State of New Jersey, a girl must be fourteen years of age before she can enter a mill. To see that the law is enforced the State employs a number of inspectors, and to make sure that the child is always at school the Board of Education has truant officers, and besides these are notaries, to ensure to the little girl her childhood by making her parents swear that she is of the legal age before she can obtain employment in a factory. These safeguards of the child the mill-owner points to and says, "There is no child labor in Paterson." Of course not. "It is prevented by law."

Last week, I stood in Paterson at the gate of a large silk factory. It was surrounded by a high brick wall. No one was allowed to enter the factory except the employees. It was a big, hideous, gloomy building. According to the report of inspectors for 1901 the factory employed five hundred and seven "hands," none of them under sixteen years of age. By and by, a whistle far up on the chimney-top, shrieked loudly and the "hands," with their dinner-pails, poured out through the gate. Not more than one-quarter of them were men, the rest were all women and girls; and of the latter, fully one hundred did not seem to be over eleven years of age. Yet it is only fair to assume that on file in the office is a certificate, signed and sealed by a notary, that every one of the little girls is at least until six in the evening on every week day, the noise of their laughter and play is not heard in this part of Paterson. With careworn, pale faces, the children form a sort of melancholy procession which "comes home" from the mill at evening. Some of them may be fourteen years old. If they are, they have already lived four or five years in the factory. But by far the greater number are certainly not over eleven. I did not enter the flax mill, for the simple reason that I was not an employee and for such as I there was "no admittance." But from the lips of men and women whose lives are spent behind the dull brick walls, I heard something of the life of the children. Part of the process of weaving flax consists in "hem steaming." In a room with a stone and cement floor, the coils of flax are wrung out in hot water in order to make it pliable for weaving. This work is performed entirely by females, many of whom are little girls. With bare feet and covered with rubber aprons, they spend what should be the happy days of childhood in a room filled with clouds of steam, twisting the wet hemp coils. Some years ago the Factory Inspector made one of his occasional visits to a hemp mill. He learned that a number of children were employed on a certain floor of the building, and made a visit to it. The proprietor, who had been apprised of the inspector's coming, had all the children taken by the elevator to the floor above and kept there until the floor in question was reported to be in "good condition." Then, while the inspector was on his way upstairs, the children were all slipped into the elevator again and sent back to their work on the floor below. The result was, that the report stated that in that particular factory no children under sixteen years of age were employed.

The pay of a little girl in either a silk or hemp factory is about the same. When she enters the mill, she receives about $1.25 a week. In the course of two or three years, her pay is gradually increased, until by the time she is fifteen years old, she makes perhaps $2.50 or 3.00 a week. This sum constitutes her wages for several years, until she is old and experienced enough to "learn the trade" of a weaver. In the flax mills, her remuneration for the work is very rarely more than $8 a week; in the silk mills, it is sometimes as high as $12.

The parents of nearly all the factory children are of foreign birth. They go to church, and in their own way try to inculcate in their daughters a veneration and love for the faiths they have brought with them across the sea. But life in the mills is not conducive to church going or Christianity, and many of the factory girls drift away from their church homes just as they do from their parents' tenements.

Who is to blame for child labor in New Jersey, and how is it going to be stopped? A man, whose life has been spent among the mill-workers of Paterson, said to me, "In certain districts of the city, there are no longer any little girls, there are only middle-aged women, and women too old to work. And yet it would be a cruelty and injustice to lay the blame for the child labor evil at the door of the parents. Among the adult workers in the flax mills, I know that it is very exceptional to find one who makes more than $8 a week. That is not enough to support a family. The only recourse for parents is to send their little girls to the mill. I suppose factories are a blessing, and so long as we have them children will continue to be the victims."

fourteen years old. Yet nothing is more certain than that the proprietor or superintendent who would deliberately and wilfully engage one of those children to work in his mill, that he might save the difference between her wages and those of an adult, would be guilty of blighting and withering her young life.

It is a necessity of the silk business that the rooms of the factory should be comfortable and well-ventilated. Dust cannot be allowed to accumulate, because it gets into the silk as it comes from the looms and injures the fabric. In order that the weavers' fingers may always be nimble in manipulating the shuttles, the rooms are comfortably heated in winter. So far as material comforts go, the life of a little girl in a silk factory is perhaps as comfortable as it would be at home or in school. But such is not the case in the flax mills. There are three flax mills in Paterson that give employment to about two thousand "hands." According to factory reports, only one hundred of these are less than sixteen years old. Near the flax mills is the tenement quarter of Paterson. Few of the families have more than two rooms and many of them possess only one. In the evenings and on Sundays the neighborhood swarms with children, but from seven o'clock in the morning

Will the Republic of Cuba Survive?

THE proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD asks me to answer the question for the benefit of your readers. It is a live question, and one that means much both to the Cuban people and to the American people. A distinguished statesman, who has had a great deal to do in the National legislation fixing the standing of Cuba, recently wrote me that he hoped above all things the Republic of Cuba would survive, because the need of the United States is a friendly, independent government in Cuba. I think that is the idea which President Roosevelt and his advisers also hold.

Now, the Cuban Republic is beset with trouble. They are having hard times in the island, such as were experienced in the United States a few years ago. The sugar industry the world over is dull, and since Cuba's chief product is sugar, the dullness is felt just as it would be felt in the United States if there were a poor market for corn and wheat, and the cost of raising these crops to the farmer was more than was received for them. Sugar, at this time in Cuba, is being raised at a loss, because of the failure of the United States Congress to enact reciprocity legislation. That is, to admit Cuban sugar into the American markets at a reduced duty.

The humorous philosopher, Mr. Dooley, sometimes gives his views on things which are in the public mind. A few months ago he wrote these apt words: "Hunger is the same in a Republic as in a despotism." The moral was, that the masses of the people in Cuba were not much better off under the Republic than under the Spanish rule, if they could not get enough to eat. The Cubans underwent starvation in order that they might have their Republic.

A few months ago it was the fear of many friends of the Cuban government, that with so many plantation hands out of work there would be riots and disorder, which might threaten the government itself and cause the United States to intervene a second time. That fear is past. The people, in spite of their distress, have kept peaceful and patient. Hard times are still ahead of them, yet the worst has been endured. In the fall there is bound to be some work in the sugar cane industry; because the plantations must be kept going, even at a loss.

But there is hope now that this season the crop will not be a loss. Under the pressure of public opinion, the American Congress is almost sure to grant the lower rates of duties for Cuban sugar and other products, which it refused in the spring. Then, also, the results of the Brussels International Conference, which agreed to doing away with the heavy bounties paid by European countries for the production of beet root, within another year will begin to benefit Cuba. Like all cane producing countries, it has suffered from the heavy bounties paid to beet sugar.

These are what are called material questions, but material questions have a good deal to do with the success of any government or administration. If, at the very beginning of its life, the Cuban government works its way through a hard times period, most folks will agree that the prospects for a longer existence are very good.

In any country we judge something of its government from the men who are honored with public positions. If they are good men and true, we think well of that government. No one doubts that the schoolmaster-president of Cuba, Tomas Estrada Palma, is a good man and a strong one, too. The pastor and his other neighbors at Central Valley, New York, where seventeen years of his life were passed as the head of a school for Cuban youths—in the farewell address which they made to him—showed their own deep esteem. Some of these neighbors went to Havana for the one purpose of seeing him inaugurated.

President Palma so far has shown his firmness and his purity of character. His aspiration is for a Cuban Republic which shall be like the American Republic. A scheme was formed to restore the lottery, which had flourished under the Spanish rule and which is found in all Spanish-American countries. It became known that President Palma was inflexibly opposed to this scheme, and would veto it if a bill should be passed by the Cuban Congress. Knowing the feeling of the president, the promoters of the lottery scheme have not been able to make headway.

The brutal bull fights, which were common under Spanish rule, were abolished by the American military authority. Efforts have been made to restore them, but Cuban public sentiment says "no."

Yet they have politicians in Cuba who are selfish, thinking only of themselves, and caring little for the public good. The same is true of the United States. On the whole, there is as much patriotism among the Cuban public men as among our own.

The Cuban Congress is formed almost exactly after the model of the Congress of the United States. It has about the same powers. There is a House of Representatives and a Senate. No law can be enacted without the sanction of both bodies. Some propositions which, to us seem very foolish, have been introduced in the Cuban Congress, but simply introducing them does not make them laws.

The chief drawback is the lack of experience. It debates a great deal and many fine speeches are made, but fine speeches in themselves do not keep the wheels of government in motion, or insure the enactment of measures beneficial to the public. But this lack of experience on the part of the Cuban Congress is in a fair way to be cured, in the only way that is possible, which is by the actual exercise of the legislative function. Experience can only come from practice, and the Cuban Congress is having a chance to practice.

From the above statements, it may be gathered that my own opinion leans to the belief that the Cuban Republic will survive. I certainly believe it will survive long enough to satisfy the mass of the Cuban people in their aspirations for independence.

There are some factions for the future which are yet to be taken into account. The leaven of Americanism is going to help the Cuban people, because a sturdy American element will find opportunities in the Island.

CHARLES M. PEPPER.

The Vagrant Rich

STUDENTS of history discover periods of great luxury in past eras, as in Nineveh, Greece and Rome, and in Paris before the French Revolution. Each of these periods has been characterized by marked class distinction, and by the contrast between the very rich and the very poor. The immense resources of our country, and the multiplication of those who hold great possessions, inherited or self-acquired, as their own, have brought about a condition of luxury never dreamed of in the most fanciful creations of the most lavish sybarite of other days. We have a class of moneyed people who may well be called vagrants, since, because of their wealth, they are wanderers on the face of the earth. They do not call one place "home," and group around it the sweet associations which we Anglo-Saxons have been wont to gather about that sacred name. They have a town house which is a palace, and two or three country houses which are magnificent edifices, surrounded by ample grounds of great beauty, and they flit from one to another, poising a little while here, a little while there, but staying nowhere long enough to strike deep roots. It often happens that the lovely gardens and grounds and the fine houses are deserted and shut up, while the non-resident owners are off on a pilgrimage to Italy or France or, it may be, to the Far East.

Of course there is no reason why our rich fellow countrymen and their families should not go abroad and see the wide world, linger where they choose, and bring home the famed pictures and rare curios which American gold can buy. Many American houses are adorned with the spoils of Egypt, Damascus, Delhi and Bombay, as well as with the carvings of Switzerland, and the crystal glass of Venice, and the mosaics of old Florence. One does not object to the loitering across the ocean of our fortunate friends, were it only an occasional thing, but one does lament its constancy, the evidence of a growing restlessness which sometimes culminates in the permanent expatriation of the travelers. One is sorry to see children brought up without that deep sense of love for and attachment to the soil which go far to making good citizens, and establishing firm and sturdy characters.

Because no other thing is so good for a child as a home, however small and simple, where he can grow from infancy to manhood, and because, in our cities, we are all more or less nomadic without our free will, it is a pity that the rich, who are independent of rents and taxes and uncramped by narrow means, should cultivate the vagrant drop in their veins.

Numbering Sins

IF we do not soberly and thankfully number our opportunities—our days, our prayers, our Sabbaths, and all our privileges—then a sadder and a more disastrous numbering surely awaits us. Think how if some day in awfulness you have to number not your blessings, but your sins. How if, like David, you have to say, "My sins have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more in number than the hairs of my head, therefore my heart faileth me." There is nothing more dreadful than the forced numbering of sins.

The dead leaf falls, the chill wind sweeps it away. How slight a thing it seems—one dead leaf! But go into the forest a little later, and there see those dead leaves rolling in ghastly heaps, rotten, numberless, into the dank and herbless soil. They are not a slight thing then.

So is it with the dead leaves that strew the floor of life—leaves of sin from which the life is gone, of sins which the sinner is done with, but which have not done with him.

Where are to be found more pitiful words than those of the brilliant, but morally weak, Hartley Coleridge, written on his twenty-fifth birthday, on the fly-leaf of his Bible:

When I received this volume small,
My years were barely seventeen,
When it was hoped I should be all,
Which once, alas, I might have been.

And now my years are twenty-five,
And every mother hopes her lamb,
And every happy child alive,
May never be what now I am.

Or take another instance. We all know the story of Lord Byron's splendid, sinful, wretched life. When the days of numbering came how unspeakably sad, how utterly heartrending they were. In all his later poems there is bitterness and despair—a wail that the bloom of the heart has fled as fast as the flush upon the cheek; that he has been driven over the shoals of guilt, the magnet lost, the sail shivered.

Oh could I feel as I have felt, or be as I have been,
Or weep as I could once have wept in many a vanished scene;
As springs in deserts found seem sweet, all brackish though they be,
So midst the withered waste of life those tears would flow to me.

And on his very last birthday, but three months before his death, he writes, though still a young man:

My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flower, the fruits of love, are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone.

Oh, if a young man would save many and many a future year, and the long hereafter, from the burning misery of vain remorse; if he would not have the sole remembrance of youth to be a bitter sigh, let him number ere God numbers; let him number his opportunities that he may not have to number his sins.

Prof. Hilprecht's Discoveries

It is due to our vigilant contemporary, The Sunday School Times, that we should note the fact that as long ago as December, 1900, that journal contained information of Professor Hilprecht's wonderful excavations on the site of ancient Babylon. Several months ago, the Professor announced in its columns, the gift of the famous Temple library to the University of Pennsylvania.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Canada at the Coronation

ONE of the most conspicuous and most admired of the decorations prepared in London for the Coronation festivities was the Canadian Arch. It had a place of honor in Whitehall, the thoroughfare identified with the execution of Charles I. and with so many other historic events. It was on the line of the King's procession and as he passed under it, he must have recalled his visit which he made in his early manhood to the great Dominion. The arch was also the scene of the great demonstration with which Dominion Day was celebrated. All the Canadian troops in London who went thither for the coronation, after doing valiant service in South Africa, assembled at the Horse Guards, the headquarters of the British Army and marched thence to the Arch, where they formed up. Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave them hearty greeting, and witnessed with just pride the intricate evolutions which were then performed in soldierly style by the men. The Arch has also an economic, as well as a patriotic interest. It bears the legend, "Canada, Britain's Granary," and around the curve, "God save our King." It was well that the home-staying citizens of London should be reminded of their indebtedness to Canada for the food supply, which it furnishes in yearly increasing volume to the teeming millions of British subjects, and that they should also remember that Canada has a share, by no means small, in the Empire that is represented in the words, "Our King." Earnest endeavors have been made by Mr. Chamberlain, during the visit, to draw Canada and the other colonies into still closer relations. The results have necessarily been disappointing, as the difficulty of framing an economic policy which should suit both a young country and an old one, proved, for the time being, insoluble. It may be, however, that the subject now seriously considered, will in the course of time, take shape in an imperial federation of mutual advantage. If such a result is attained it may be the precursor of still more extended unions, until eventually at long-expected time arrives when the whole earth shall be as one people under the kingship of the King of Kings.

And the Lord shall be King over all the earth (Zech. 14:9).

Graves Give up their Dead

A grewsome spectacle was witnessed at Madison, N. J. on August 10. There was a cloudburst in the Raritan and Passaic districts, and all the low-lying country was inundated. The full force of the flood descended on the cemetery at Madison, and made shocking havoc of the well-kept grounds. The waters swept with a hideous rush over the graves, cutting a trench fifty feet wide and twenty feet deep through the cemetery. Coffins were in some instances torn out intact, but in others they were splintered, and the corpses floated out.

It was near midnight, but the people realized that if they waited till morning, the bodies of friends and relatives would be carried away by the angry Passaic. They went out with lanterns and rescued about seventy bodies. Only a few could be recognized, by articles of jewelry that had been buried with them. The others, for sanitary reasons, were immediately reburied in unmarked graves. It must be very stressing to those who loved the dead to think that their resting place cannot now be identified; but if they now that their souls are in God's keeping, they need not grieve over the loss of the bodies.

I know that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day (II. Tim. 1:12).

Long-Lost Mine Found

News comes from Wyoming of the finding of the old Cabin Gold Mine which has been sought by prospectors for nearly thirty years. It was originally discovered in 1869, but the party who found it fell in an attack by Indians and only one survived. It was some time before he recovered from the shock, and when he returned with some friends he was unable to locate the mine. The stories he told of its fabulous wealth fired the cupidity of many prospectors, but he died before he could organize another search expedition. Starting without clues, hundreds of miners searched for the mine and some of them have devoted ten years to the search without success. Now comes the announcement that two seekers, who have systematically searched for it for twelve years, have found the entrance in a cave on the side of a perpendicular cliff. That it is the real mine is proved by the discovery of the names of the original finders cut into the rock on the side of the cave. The two men staked off the richest claims and then told their secret. Immediately there was the greatest stampede ever known in the district. Many towns are almost entirely deserted by men anxious to secure a claim. No one is surprised at a rush in a case like this where riches may be easily acquired; but it is sad to think how slow people are to seek that spiritual wealth which, as the Psalmist said, is far superior.

More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold (Psalm 19:10).

Lost His Savings

An immigrant who came to this country about five years ago has just suffered a loss that threatens to impair his reason. He has worked hard, has always been employed and was remarkably careful of his expenditures. It was evident that he must be saving money, and his acquaintances were curious as to what he did with it. One or another advised different investments market. Many peers and peeresses had special coronets made for the occasion, as those in the family safes were old-fashioned or did not fit the wearers. It is sixty years since there was a coronation before, and in that time the fashions, even in those rarely-worn head-coverings, have changed. Men and women have a greater desire for comfort than formerly, and saw no sense in wearing the ponderous coronets once in fashion, when lighter ones were more graceful and much easier. But the ceremony past, the poorer peers propose disposing of the coronets instead of hiding them away for a period that every one hopes will be a long one. The Queen has set the example, by instructing her jewelers to sell the 3,688 gems which glittered in the crown that the Archbishop of York placed on her head. The Koh-i-noor, one of the most famous diamonds in the world, which was set in her crown, of course will not be sold, but the smaller gems, said to be worth fully a million dollars, are to go to buyers. Each gem will be accompanied by a certificate that it was in the Queen's crown, so that its sentimental value will be enhanced. Probably many of the gems will be brought to this country and will find ready purchasers, who will be proud to possess jewels that have adorned a Queen's crown. Unhappily, that infinitely greater privilege, which all may possess who desire it, and seek it through Christ, is too often neglected:

When the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away (I Peter 5:4).

A Modern Lochinvar

A marriage took place recently in Indiana, which recalls the old Scottish story and the more ancient incidents of the Sabines and the Benjamites. An employee of the Lake Shore and Michigan Railroad became engaged to a lady living at Fort Wayne, Ind. The wooing proceeded favorably and a day was set for the marriage, when the consent of the parents of the prospective bride was withdrawn. A new wooer from Bluffton appeared on the scene, who enjoyed the favor of the young lady's parents. The lady apparently accepted him, and arrangements for the wedding were made at once. The ceremony had actually commenced when the former suitor, armed with a revolver, rushed in and forbade the clergyman to proceed. Before the wedding-guests could recover from their alarm, the intruder seized the bride by the arm and drew her out of the house to the street, where a carriage was waiting. The couple entered it and drove away to the house of another clergyman, who united them in marriage. The lady was doubtless a willing captive, howsoever she may have pretended to yield to force. No man in our day would attempt to secure a wife against her own inclination. It is so, too, with Satan's captives. He wins souls because they are willing to be won, though they often plead the force of temptation.

Resist the devil and he will flee from you (James 4:7).

and some of them urged him to put it in a savings bank. To all he turned a deaf ear, reminding his advisers of this and that acquaintance who had lost money by the failure of a bank or of an investment. One night last week there was a fire in the house where he boarded. The firemen found him in bed almost stifled by smoke and quite unconscious. They carried him down, and after working over him for some time revived him. To their surprise he instantly made a rush for the burning building, and was with difficulty kept from going to certain death. When the fire had burned itself out, he made a frantic search for the treasure, which was under his pillow when he went to bed, but it had been utterly consumed. In keeping the money in his own custody, he had avoided the danger of losing it through the faults of others, but he lost it just as surely. He will doubtless begin to save again, as is only prudent, but we may hope that his experience will lead him to secure also that better treasure which Christ urges his people to gain.

Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal (Matt. 6:20).

Crowns for Sale

Cable dispatches from London intimate that interesting souvenirs of the Coronation will soon be on the market. More than one thousand delegates from all lands attended the World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations.

The Sunday School Union will celebrate its centenary next year. It was organized twenty-three years after Robert Raikes opened the first Sunday School.

Mr. Balfour, the new Premier of Great Britain, is a devout Presbyterian. He never allows political business to interfere with his observance of the Lord's Day.

Mr. H. B. Silliman, of Cohoes, N. Y., a trustee of Mount Hermon School, has given $10,000 for improving and developing the buildings in the line Mr. D. L. Moody so earnestly desired.

Rev. George Johnston Ross, of London, has been delivering stirring addresses at the National Bible Conference at Winona Lake, Ind. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman's sermons to ministers, of whom over one thousand were present, were deeply impressive.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature makes Sept. 14 Bible Study Sunday this year. Pastors are urged to preach on that day on some phase of the subject: "Bible Study in its relation to the Life and Work of the Church, and of the Individual Christian."

Sir J. Gordon Sprigg, Premier of Cape Colony, made a speech during his stay in London on the observance of the Lord's Day. He expressed his firm conviction that no man could really prosper or live to old age who failed to observe the weekly day of rest, and that no country could ever be prosperous where there was Sunday trading or Sunday excursions for pleasure.

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, has commissioned two new men for the work in Alaska. The Rev. Herman M. An American Woman in Royal Palaces

By Mary Grant Cramer (Sister of the Late President U. S. Grant*)

THESE times of coronation joys and sorrows bring vividly to my memory the days when, as wife of the United States Consul at Copenhagen and as a traveler on the Continent, I came face to face with many who bore the glory and the burden of a crown; and when I saw the bright and gloomy side of life for those who sit in royal palaces. Once, in the Tower of London, when admiring the dazzling gems that compose the Regalia, I asked a royal attendant if Queen Victoria's crown was not weighty and oppressive. He replied, "Oh, she does not knock about in it."

It was only a glimpse that we had of the old German Emperor in Berlin one morning, as he was driving through Unter-den-Linden, to start on a hunting expedition. On a later visit to Berlin, my husband had an interesting and instructive conversation with Prince Bismarck. The present Emperor had not an imperial look when we, glancing through a palace window, beheld him, a youth, walking with his sister on common earth. We were in the splendid "Grotto Chamber," in the "New Palace" at Potsdam, erected by Frederick the Great, long enough ago to be called an old palace.

On different occasions in Denmark I saw Queen Alexandra, then Princess of Wales, while she was visiting her parents, the King and Queen of Denmark. On the occasion of an audience I had with mother and daughter, the children of Alexandra made a pretty group, near a window of the Queen's reception room. George, now Prince of Wales, left the other children and crowded himself down on the sofa, between his mother and grandmother. The Princess told me his name, and, in her remarks about her children, referred to the one she had lost.

At a function in this palace, I observed that Alexandra was decidedly the prettiest lady in the large and brilliant assembly. On such occasions, it is customary for the royal family to enter by a side door, the room where the Diplomatic Corps, and the highest Danish nobility, including military officers, are assembled; the Queen and other royal ladies pass to the right, and the King and Crown Prince to the left, speaking a few words to each guest in the semicircle, as they make the tour of the room. When the Princess of Wales addressed me, at intervals, she glanced back of me, with a merry, mischievous look and a nod, and I wondered who was the object of her attention, but I dared not look until she was engaged in conversation with the wife of a minister; then I saw that Miss Knollys, the Court lady of the Princess, was standing behind me; the Princess looked prettier than ever when she smiled in that roguish way.

The Danish Queen sat on a raised dais, and invited two ladies to sit beside her. Very few people, except royal ladies and those of the diplomatic corps, could be seated; partly on this account, the King's musical soirees, where all the guests could be seated, were hailed with joy. On one occasion his Majesty was late making his appearance, because he went to a large fire to cheer and encourage the firemen.

For my first audience with the aged widow of Frederick VI., I drove out to her country palace at "Sorgenfri," which means "without care." We conversed in German. While cordial and affable, she had the courtly manners belonging to her station. When driving out, she put on more style than did the Queen. The latter drove two horses, and the tinkling of the bells they wore gave a musical hint of her approach; the Queen-Dowager rode in a cumbersome, old-fashioned carriage drawn by four horses, preceded by an outrider in scarlet livery, to correspond with that of the driver and footman on the box. One day my little girl was invited to ride in this stately equipage.

During my interview with the royal hostess of Sorgenfri, I observed, in glancing through an open window, the beautiful roses with which the bushes were laden. It was very thoughtful in the dear old lady a few days later to send a royal servant with a quantity of choice roses to our hotel, accompanied by a note from Miss Von Rosen, saying that her Majesty had gathered them with her own hands for me. Those hands were folded to rest for the last time, near the close of our residence in Copenhagen. Princess Carolina, her stepdaughter, soon followed. Of course her death, and that of the Queen Dowager, put the court into deep mourning and terminated the gayeties for the season. In case of a royal death, a court circular was always sent to the legations, prescribing the length of time for wearing symbols of grief. After reading the court circular, I sought further light on the subject from Countess Redenlow. I felt dismayed when, in speaking of the veils we would be expected to wear to the funeral, the countess said: "I will inquire the width of the hem and will tell you." Another horror was the "snip," a small three-cornered piece of crape, to be worn at the part of the hair, with the point hanging over the forehead. I quickly decided not to be thus branded, and remained away from the royal funeral; the diplomats were only required to wear crape on their arms. After the Russian Emperor was assassinated, royalty, the diplomatic corps and others assembled in the mourning-draped Greek chapel at a service held there, as an expression of sympathy with the nation and family bereaved. The Crown Princess looked like the personification of night in her sable robes.

*The time when most of these incidents occurred was during General Ulysses S. Grant's Presidency. General Grant, who was Mrs. Cramer's brother, appointed her husband U. S. Consul at Copenhagen.

I had last met the Crown Princess in public at the King's birthday party, in Christiansborg castle, when she was attired in heavy white silk, the only color about her being large rubies, the central stones for innumerable brilliants blazing in a vine-like circle around her head, neck, in her ears, and over her bodice. A broad diamond bracelet glittered around her arm. I saw the Princess in a pink silk, garlanded with roses, a diamond trembling, like a dewdrop, in every rose.

I enjoyed conversing with her Highness. She was possessed of much intelligence and good sense, and appreciated the responsibility of having children to train. She was even more hedged about by court etiquette than the Queen, who sometimes received callers on other occasions than New Year's. On New Year's it was the custom for the Diplomatic Corps and exalted Danish nobility to have audience with royalty. The Diplomatic Corps, in uniform, with orders and decorations, called in a body at three different palaces. In the evening they met again in Christiansborg Castle. Here the King always gave a splendid banquet the first night of the new year, attended by the chief members of the nobility and by home and foreign officials. No ladies were present, except royal ones, and their maids of honor.

In the so-called Yellow Palace, close by, I had an interview with the attractive Queen of Greece. When the Diplomatic Corps had an audience with her Majesty, my husband observed that she conversed with each minister in his native tongue. We met her and the King of Greece one night in the country palace of Bernstorf, at a feast in honor of the birthday anniversary of his mother, Queen Louise, who, in those days, had a pleasing personality and pleasant manners. She was especially fond of music, and sometimes wielded the baton at little musical entertainments given at the palace. I never saw the Queen dance, but know that Queen Olga liked it. She observed one night that I did not dance, and when I replied, "No, I do not care for it," exhibited surprise. Royal ladies indicate with whom they wish to dance. The first winter my husband was at court he was told by the master of ceremonies at a ball that he might request the Princess Thyra to become his partner, but he had to waive the honor, as he, like myself, had not acquired the fashionable accomplishment.

The most brilliant court function in which I ever participated, was a banquet given by the Danish royalties, June, 1875, to the King and Queen of Sweden in Christiansborg Castle. (A portion of this castle was destroyed by fire years afterwards; when it was burning, the late Queen exclaimed: "Now, indeed, are we poor, for we have no place in which to entertain royal visitors.") When their Swedish Majesties arrived in Copenhagen, they were received at the landing by the whole royal family, the cabinet ministers, the court officials, and the higher civil, military and naval officers, together with the chief magistrate and city council of Copenhagen. They dined later, en famille, with the Danish royal family, and in the evening attended a grand soiree given in their honor at the palace of the Crown Prince. All the high officials of the city, and their wives, were present. On the arrival of their Majesties, the Crown Prince went below to receive them, and his princess welcomed them into the ante-room above. Having taken the place assigned me, near the door, between a German baroness and a Russian princess (of the Russian legation), it soon came my turn to be presented to the Swedish-Norwegian monarchs. They exchanged a few words with all presented. The King, who is very tall, wore, like other gentlemen present, plain evening dress, ornamented with orders and decorations. The Queen was clad in scarlet silk and white lace, with ornaments of diamonds and pearls, and a long, scarlet feather worn in her hair.

Imported strawberries, costing $18 a pound, were part of the refreshments. At four the next day a state dinner was given in the Knight's Hall of Christiansborg Palace. Court ladies and wives of officials were attired in a manner befitting the august occasion; gentlemen in gala uniform, blazing with orders and decorations. Of course the American minister was an exception, as our foreign representatives were not allowed by our government to wear uniform or decorations.

When the folding doors opened the Swedish Queen entered, leaning on the arm of King Christian; her Majesty was in straw-colored silk, and adorned with rubies, lace and violets; and on her head was a magnificent tiara, surpassing anything I had seen, outside of Rosenberg Castle and the Green Vaults of Dresden. Next, escorted by King Oscar, came the Danish Queen, in wine-colored silk and a wealth of diamonds. Then the Crown Princess appeared, led by the King's brother, Prince Hans. She wore pink silver moire, silver gauze, and was all a-glitter with diamonds. As the royal party entered the apartment where the guests were assembled, all bowed low to each couple and again, as they approached the opposite doorway, profound courtesies were made. Then our company (about 140 in number) fell into line, and followed them over the polished inlaid floor of a large room, into a still more spacious apartment, upholstered in yellow satin; then into a smaller one furnished in blue adjoining the immense dining-saloon. As we entered the last, the music in the balcony caused us to look up, when lo! a battery of eyes, that extended the entire length of the galleries on either side of the Knight's Hall, returned our gaze. One of the Queen's ladies-in-waiting informed me there had been 3,000 applications for places in the galleries.

The long table at which the guests sat was in the shape of a horseshoe; the menu consisted of fourteen courses. The Danish colors, red and white, surrounded the handsomely printed menu. Two orchestras in the galleries at each end of the hall played alternately, and sometimes in concert. We ate first from silver plates, then china, on which landscapes and castles were painted; later, the much admired Flora Danica (the wild flowers of Denmark) china, was placed before us. My painting teacher told me that the Princess of Wales and a very rich banker were the only persons who had a complete set of this china. This teacher had assisted in painting the Princess' set, and said it took a year.

Near the close of the sumptuous dinner, the Danish King arose and spoke of the presence of their Majesties, the King and Queen of Sweden and Norway as a joyful evidence of the friendly relations existing between their people and those of Denmark.

HOME THOUGHTS IN THE PORCH

By Margaret E. Sangster

A Case of Desiccation

THAT woman has not developed, she has merely dried up," said the doctor's wife, as she saw tripping down the street, with the airy grace of sixteen, a somewhat slender lady of fifty. Needless to observe, the lady was a spinster, and one whose household duties had been few and her cares light. She was well dressed and had the manner of one born to the purple.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Jessamy, lifting her eyes from her embroidery frame, "Miss Mahala Martin is in some respects the youngest woman I know. She makes one think of a pressed flower, hidden away in the middle of a herbarium, faded, but classified correctly as to family and species. Miss Mahala is an old-fashioned gentlewoman. She could not do or say a discourteous thing. But she is no farther on in real maturity than she was at twenty. As for taking an independent stand, or seizing an initiative, she couldn't. She is terribly afraid of criticism. And she has still no little sentiment in her poor middle-aged heart, sentiment enough to make her conscious in general society, and among men that she is as yet unmarried and eligible."

"Eligible!" cried the girl just at home from college. "Why, mother, she's prehistoric. Nobody would think of courting Miss Mahala."

"Nevertheless, when your Cousin Fanny asked her if she would chaperone Louise and Marjory on their journey to the springs last month, she hesitated, and asked if it would be good form, would it not be better to have some married lady of more experience. She hardly thought she could take charge of young girls."

"The truth is," said Ellen Darling, our little schoolmarm, who always has a wise word to say, like a nail fastened in a sure place, "that Miss Mahala's mind has been too long a fallow field. She has not exercised her faculties and they have grown rusty. If only she could lose her money and be thrown upon her own resources, or if she should even now take up with energy and thoroughness any new line of study, you would perceive a change. The dry stem would put forth leaves and blossoms. Miss Mahala has lived in a rut. She is the victim of routine: she reads only for amusement, and she is growing old without the richness of the garnered sheaves. For my part, I am sorry for her. If, at this late day, Miss Mahala should marry, equally she would become a more winsome and a happier woman."

I fancy that Ellen is right. But I wish there were fewer desiccated specimens of womanhood extant.

A Sharp Manner

"Jane does herself a great deal of injustice," said Aunt Phebe, "by the sharpness of her manner. She pounces on your least mistake with the unerring precision of a cat upon a mouse. She differs from those older than herself, not modestly, but with emphasis. And she has fallen into a habit of using strong language on slight occasions. It is foolish to drive in a carpet tack with a sledge hammer. If she is not careful, the habit will grow upon her. Habits always become fixed with time and use."

Child Labor in the South

Slavery of the colored race is no longer existent in our Southern States; but the labor of little white children in the cotton mills is an evil which needs to be remedied, and is as great a blunder as ever was slavery. Intelligent Southerners are trying to procure legislation which shall set farther on the age at which children shall be employed, and which shall assure to every child under sixteen, twelve weeks in school during each year. The Women's Clubs, foremost in good works, have this matter under consideration. It is heart-breaking to think of children of tender years, working in factories, from early morning till dark, breathing close air, thick with flying lint, and growing pallid and bent at unremitting toil. The cry of the little mill hands of Alabama and Georgia ascends to heaven, how long, O Lord, how long?

Grateful for Fragrance

A lady entered a passenger car with a great splendid sheaf of pink carnations in her hands. They were all she could carry. Every traveler brightened up at the bloom and the scent. "We may all enjoy it," said one tired woman. The conductor said, "I am grateful to you for bringing those beautiful flowers into this car. They are so sweet. A little fragrance does sweeten a weary day."

Don't Overwork

I wish I could persuade my dear sisters not to overwork. The other day I read the memoir of one of the most gifted and saintly of her sex. She died in her youth, of exhaustion, evidently the natural fruit of an energy that was unresting, a toil that was unremitting. Do not let your work drive you. Occasionally sit down in the middle of it, and fold your hands and let everything go. The sun will shine on just the same when you lie in your grave. Somebody else will make the children's frocks, and sweep the house, and plant the garden, and

ROBIN REDBREAST

O CHEERY Robin Redbreast
You seem to sing of Spring,
With your wild bursts of melody,
Like some free, untamed thing.

You make the green wood echo,
You make the welkin ring,
You make me think of springing flowers,
Which Summer soon shall bring.

Beneath your crimson waistcoat
There beats a true, brave heart,
Which takes life's storms with fortitude,
And bravely bears your part.

You trill so gaily to your mate,
Who listeneth above,
Within her nest, on four blue eggs,
Your song seems all of love.

We all can take a lesson
From Robin's joyous song,
'Twill make life's pathway brighter,
And help us all along.

—LILIAN.

Decayed Gentlewomen

IN the days when Jane Austen wrote her wonderfully faithful novels describing English life, there were ladies who filled the role of decayed gentlewomen to perfection. Few of them are seen at present, for it has become decidedly the fashion for women to help themselves, and very seldom does one discover the exact type of antiquated helplessness that was once almost pitifully frequent. Yet occasionally, a decayed gentlewoman, dressed with threadbare elegance, willowly of figure, languid of pose and plaintive of manner, drifts like a bit of thistle down blown before the wind, into a business office and presents her timidly assertive plea for immediate attention.

One such woman, elderly, gentle, and manifestly incapable, came toward a man's desk the other day, seeking employment "fit for a lady."

Inquiry elicited the acknowledgment that she knew nothing at all in the bread-winning lines. She had always had a fortune, and had traveled, or stayed at home in luxury. She was not very strong, and could not bear confinement or steady work. "But surely," she added, "a woman of my antecedents and acquaintance with life, must be needed somewhere!"

They are to be compassionate, these people who are not practical and who have never had to knock about the world and endure its hardships. And as a sudden turn of fortune's wheel may, at any time, make the daughter of some well-to-do American penniless, why should not every girl, in her youth, prepare for emergencies that may swamp her in later life, by acquiring thoroughly some trade or profession, that is sufficiently in demand to keep the wolf of penury from her door!

The Pie-Makers' Strike

The newspapers, the other day, published an item which threw a sort of flash-light on the way a big town like New York is fed. It appears that New Yorkers consume 75,000 pies of all descriptions every day, and that this immense order is filled by three or four bakeries that sell home-made pies. The bakers who turn out the flaky productions, top crust, under crust and fruity layers between, go on duty at midnight daily and work for ten hours, making from $14.00 to $25.00 per week according to their skill. They are satisfied with their wages, but are tired of their hours, and demand liberty to make pies by daylight. This seems reasonable, yet if the pie makers conquer, the bread and cake makers will follow, and whence shall citizens procure hot rolls for an early breakfast. The age is full of unrest, and strikes are in the air. May they be but signs of the times, presaging a better era when the brotherhood of man shall be acknowledged the world around. Meanwhile, the eaters of 75,000 daily pies would be much less in danger of dyspepsia should they eat stewed fruit.

write the books, and paint the pictures, for God's work never stops, even though the workers drop prematurely in the springtime of years that ought to ripen to a rich autumn. Don't overwork, dear women; determine to do the best you can, but when you reach your limit of strength, sit still, and thus take in new vigor.

Those Stooping Shoulders

"That child stoops. She thrusts her head forward and her shoulders are bent. What is the reason?" It may be that she is a little short-sighted, and therefore bends forward over her books. She may have a desk too low for her or sit in a shadowy corner in school. Let her mother investigate this matter at once. She may be growing too fast for her strength. She may simply have formed a very bad habit.

The negroes in the South used to carry themselves superbly, because they "toted" weights on their heads. A colored maid, straight as an arrow, came into her mistress's room the other day, carrying a basket of clothes in her hand and a glass of water on her head. A child may be trained to a very great distinction of carriage, by the simple plan of walking up and down every day with a book on her head.

Law and Love and Liberty

LOVING AND OBEYING GOD

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 14
DEUT. 30: 11-20

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"THIS IS THE LOVE OF GOD, THAT WE KEEP HIS COMMANDMENTS." I. JOHN 5: 3

MOSES, now one hundred and twenty years old but in full vigor, is standing in the presence of his people, the Jews, gathered on the plains of Moab, just across the Jordan from Palestine, to hear his words of farewell. He has already rehearsed a second time all of God's laws given to him for them on the mountain top of Sinai. And he has commanded that when they shall have crossed the River Jordan, they shall set up great stones and cover them with plaster, and in it write God's laws. He has declared the curses that will come if they keep not these laws, the blessings that will be theirs if they remember and do them. It is altogether like a grand oratorio in a setting of mountain and plain. It would not be complete without a tender refrain. Moses, the lawgiver, becomes Moses, the tender, elder brother, as he urges obedience, on the ground of love to the Heavenly Father. He seems to have in mind the command, "Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." He says to them, "Love the Lord, thy God . . . for he is thy life, and the length of thy days, that thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob to give them." His appeal to them had risen from, "Obey—Live," to the nobler strain, "Love and Live." We can associate "Obey—Live," but we can not link them together. Moses showed his people that they should live on the plateau of love, serving God freely as sons, not on the lower plane of servants. "It is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. It is in thy mouth, and in thy heart." Here we may quote, as we have done before, the great word of George MacDonald: "When God's law is our law we are but a kind of noble slaves, but when his will is our will, then are we his free children." Moses would have his people become God's loving children, doing God's will and obeying all of his laws because it was their greatest pleasure to do so. Love knows not obligation, but only privilege and opportunity. Paul found it no labor to pray and work for that first church he founded in Europe, at Philippi, because, as he wrote in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Philippians, he had them in his heart. Moses casts a longing look upon the Israelites with those eyes that are not dimmed with age, ere he turns to leave them, that he may ascend the mountain to die, according to the summons of God.

And these are his last words:

"Love the Lord thy God, that thou mayest obey his voice."

Illustration and Application

How God's law is the expression of his loving wisdom:

1. In that God's law is plain and near addressed to the heart and practicable (verse 11-14).

2. In that God's law is addressed to our free choice (verse 15).

3. In that by free obedience to God's law, we, too, can show our love to God in return, while God's love again returns on us in time of prosperity, as the reward of obedience (verse 16).

4. In that God constrains us to obey his wise laws by love's warnings as well as by rewards (verse 17-20).

This commandment is not hidden. It is claimed that wireless telegraphy has long been known to the Yogas or Magi of the hills of India, but, if so, they kept it as a professional secret for their private use. Marconi is the Moses who has brought it down from the hills to the people. Not alone to a few Brahmins or scribes or masters of mysteries is God's law given, but it is revealed in the Bible so plainly, that the unlearned may not only know and practice but even teach it. "I don't like the idea of your going about preaching," said the squire to a Cornish miller, who was a Methodist local preacher.

"I don't praich, sir."

"But you conduct the service, and go into the pulpit, and take a text and explain it. You must know you are very ignorant. I want you to consider whether a man ought, with so few advantages as you have, to take upon himself the responsibility to teach others. Suppose you made a mistake." "Aw, sir, I've thought of that. I do pray God every day to guide me with his Holy Spirit."

The squire explained that university training was necessary for preachers who would guide others.

"Squire," said the miller, looking at the wall, "is that the map of your estate?"

The squire assented.

"I s'pose you do know that map perty well, don't 'ee? Every road, and every pathway, and every waterway?"

"Yes, yes."

"Well, squire, do you remember the other day you was down to the mill, and you asked my li'l Mary to show you the pathway through the woods? I've been thinkin' 'tes like this 'ere. You knowed that road 'pon the map. If you asked li'l Mary what 'a was called—'pon the map, mind—she wouldn't 'ave been able t' tell 'ee. But li'l Mary showed you the way 'up through the woods. You knowed the way 'pon the map, but li'l Mary knowed the way by walkin' in et; and if I don't know the way 'pon the map so well as some people, bless the Lord, I do know the way to heaven by walkin' in et."

Neither is it afar off.—Even in the Old Testament the divine Lawgiver seemed ever near. Every living plant was to ancient Israel filled with his presence, and every movement of nature and history was ruled by his laws. Sometime Jehovah came near in visible form—thirty-four times in the four thousand Old Testament years! But in the earthly life of Jesus, the living Word or revelation of God was indeed "brought nigh."

No distant Lord have I,
Loving afar to be;
Made flesh for me, he cannot rest
Until he rests in me.

Brother in joy and pain,
Bone of my bone was he,
Now—intimacy closer still,
He dwells himself in me.

I need not journey far
This dearest Friend to see,
Companionship is always mine,
He makes his home with me.
—MALTBIE D. BABCOCK.

The word is in thy heart that thou mayest do it.—This is not the first time God had bidden his people receive his laws into their hearts (Deut. 6: 4-8). The law coming from God's heart was to be received in man's heart. A father's love makes laws to save his child from sorrow, and the child should love the law thus prompted, and the lawgiver, and show that love by obedience. Even as we write, in a

Hearts as Tables of Law

SCENE OF THE FINAL PARTING BETWEEN MOSES AND THE PEOPLE

Y.M.C.A. Summer Camp, there comes from a distance the morning Bible study song,

O, how love I thy law,
It is my meditation all the day!

Over and over again we need to correct the persistent, popular error that love and law are antagonistic or at least opposites. They are really but root and fruit of the same divine tree. And it is equally an error to set law in contrast to liberty. God's love reveals his laws to shield his children from the consequences of disobeying them, and if we receive these laws as messages of love from a Father, and obey them as his "free children," then do we find the unity in trinity of love and law and liberty. When our transformed hearts come to love what God loves, and hate what God hates, then is law no constraint, for what we permit ourselves is what God permits, and what we forbid ourselves is what God forbids. The much-abused "keys" God gives not to Peter only but to all whose obedience rises from the unwilling service of servants to loving obedience of sons.

The sentimental and the practical are sometimes contrasted. But Jesus, in his last discourses, declared five times over, in varying words, "If a man love me he will keep my words." As God's love to us is shown in his laws, which are "for our good always," so our love to him is shown in obeying those laws from the heart. "Why," said a child, "is it so hard to do right and so easy to do wrong?" It would not be so hard if head and heart were not both wrong. Let the head but consider that God's laws are loving warnings of a Father, and let the heart be transformed to love what he loves, and it will be at least easier to do right and harder to do wrong. Mr. Moody reminds us that "a purpose in the head that is not also in the heart does not last long." Homing pigeons, carried hundreds of miles from home, on being let go with some message in a quill tied in their tail feathers, rise into the air, circle round and round till their love of home tells them which way it lies, and then they speed homeward at the rate of sixty miles an hour. We speed Godward in his service when our hearts have made their home in him.

See, I have set before thee this day life and good, death and evil. Mr. Moody reminds us that "everything in the world but the human heart obeys God."

The Peril and Preciousness of Liberty But nothing else has the Godlike power of choice. The mineral can not choose whether it will be a diamond for a crown or a falling rock that shall crush out a life.

The plant can not choose whether it will feed or poison man or beast. The bird can not choose whether it will be a butcher bird or a songster. And so it is no virtue in anything that it is useful, no sin that it is a blight. But man is given the awful power of choice by which he can become "only a little less than God," if he will, or live such a life that it were "better for him that he had never been born."

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishment the scroll;
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

God helps us by bringing knowledge to our heads, and by revealing his love to our hearts, and, if our wills open the door, he comes in to re-enforce our power to do; but he will not force our wills. "If any man will open the door," he says, "I will come in." Wishing will not save me, weeping will not save me; only "willing to do his will" can admit Christ into my soul. "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

I command thee this day to love. We think of love as something that can be attracted, but not demanded. But Moses and Christ and Paul, all sum up all commandments in, "Thou shalt love." The will, as we shall find if we look closely, has much to do with our likes and dislikes. The Bible uses the word, "disbelief" to express, not honest doubt, which is "unbelief," but rather wilful doubt, due to a bad life that refuses to consider what would interfere with its sins. On the other hand, we can learn to love whatever is noble by distinctly choosing to consider it, and especially by welcoming the transforming love of God into our hearts, which makes us love God and whatever is God-like. If you love bad things, therefore, it is not your misfortune, but your fault. As Longfellow has said:

Man-like is it to fall into sin,
Fiend-like is it to dwell therein,
Christ-like is it for sin to grieve,
God-like is it all sin to leave.

If thine heart turn away, ye shall surely perish. In nothing more truly than in Love's warnings does true love show itself. One who loves but slightly may withhold a warning lest it cause pain to-day, but "faithful are the wounds of a friend" that save us from the greater pain on the morrow. An Indian, asked to define conscience, said: "It is a little three-cornered thing in here. When I do wrong it turns around and hurts very much. If I keep on doing wrong, it will turn until it wears the edges all off and then it will not hurt any more." Conscience is God's warning instrument, to halt us or change our course, as a train is stopped by the block signal, when getting dangerously near another train, and as ships are warned to change their course to avoid the yet invisible iceberg that has not proclaimed itself to man's eye, but only to the delicate thermometer in the water beside the vessel. There is in the Treasury Department a "Conscience Fund," made up of money returned by persons who got it fraudulently, by evading customs duties, or in some other way, but were constrained to return it by a reproving conscience. On Thanksgiving week last year $18,666 was received from one unknown person for this fund, the largest contribution ever made to it. The previous week $5,000 was received in one remittance, and this year $5,875 came from one person to cancel a fraudulent withholding of an internal revenue payment.

He is thy life and the length of thy days. "Prayer and provender hinder no man's journey," and true Christian living never hinders true success. "Right wrongs no man." It is related that a cavalry officer who was fleeing, with a few scouts only, before a superior force close at hand, discovered that his saddle girth was loosening, and just when his comrades were urging him to greater speed, dismounted and tightened the girth, and then rode on at utmost speed and escaped, which he could not have done but for that timely pause. So the man who is rushing on in business and politics and pleasure, who pauses for prayer and thoughts of God and duty, will outrun in true success the man who has no time to tighten the buckles of his inner life.

That is a quaint but very suggestive figure of old George Herbert's, when he says:

Sum up at night what thou hast done by day
And in the morning what thou hast to do.
Dress and undress thy soul.

Orphan Training in India

A SPECIMEN REPORT FROM ONE OF THE INSTITUTIONS IN WHICH "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" PROTEGES ARE SHELTERED

VERY gratifying are the reports that come from the Orphanages and Mission Schools of India, of the progress of the orphans who are being supported by readers of this journal. The latest arrival is a report from Baroda, in the Gujarat district, in which institution there are 151 CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans, and in the associate institution at the same town, 192, making in all 343 children, now being maintained and educated at the cost of our readers.

Miss Mary E. Williams, who is Principal of the girls' school, says that the children show a remarkable degree of intelligence and a most commendable attention to their studies. The Government makes a small grant in aid of the work, the amount being regulated by the progress attained by the pupils. A Government Inspector visits the school at certain intervals and examines the children, and on his report depends the amount contributother schools, the girls at Baroda are deeply impressed by the superiority of Christianity over the complicated and absurd religion of Hinduism, and there is little doubt that all will be brought to accept it before they leave the school, and earnest prayers are offered by the managers that they will become experimentally acquainted with its life-giving doctrines.

In the boys' school, interest centres in the Industrial Department, though the ordinary educational grades are in operation as in the girls' school. The workshops include two open sheds, each sixty feet long, in which a skilled native carpenter, who has become a convert to Christianity, reigns supreme. In the rear are five separate buildings, devoted to weaving, furniture-making, shoe-making, tin-smithing, tailoring and other trades. The teachers in every branch are skilful workmen and they have brought the boys up to a remarkable stage of proficiency.

THE CARPENTERS' SHOP IN A MISSION ORPHANAGE IN INDIA

ed by the Government. It is noticed that the visit of the Inspector and his thorough examination acts as an incentive to the teachers to do their best work. There are six grades or standards in the schools, besides the kindergarten. Next in authority to Miss Williams, is Miss McPherson, who is a graduate from Miss Thoburn's training institution at Lucknow. The next in order is Anandrao Shastri, a native, who has had a college education. The Fourth Grade is in charge of James Tribhuvas, a graduate of the Irish Presbyterian Mission College. A cultured, refined native lady, who has charge of the Second Grade, also teaches sewing, and received from the Inspector at his last visit a glowing tribute of praise when he critically examined the specimens of the girls' work.

The kindergarten department which Miss McPherson specially superintends has proved a great success. The songs, games, and occupations are all based on kindergarten principles, and have all the fascination for the little brown-skinned pupils that they have in the home land. The room devoted to it is large and well lighted and ventilated. It is adorned with specimens of kindergarten work, of which the children are very proud.

In the higher grades English is taught, and it is surprising how eagerly the children strive to master the language. At first, their pronunciation is so labored that the familiar words have a foreign sound that makes them unrecognizable, but gradually the Indian accent is overcome and to the intense delight of the child she can wish her teacher good morning and say a few sentences of simple English words. They all know that the probabilities of obtaining remunerative employment are greatly increased by the acquisition of the language, and therefore they give special pains to it.

Every day the whole school has a period of Bible study and each session is opened by devotional exercises. As in Besides these, there is a large garden where the boys are taught horticulture and farming by American methods.

The Baroda Orphanage was founded by Rev. Edwin F. Frease, who served on the Inter-Denominational Committee organized by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and rendered most efficient service throughout the famine. Mr. Frease is a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church and has been fifteen years in India. His sphere of labor is in Gujarat, which province, with that of Rajputana, bore the chief brunt of the famine. The Methodist Episcopal Missions have a large number of orphans in their stations, and it is gratifying to know that so many of them have obtained support among our readers. Large numbers also are in the Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian and Alliance Orphanages, who are all, like those at Baroda, making excellent progress and promise to prove intelligent and useful Christian citizens. Of all the enterprises that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been privileged to initiate and which its readers have so generously supported, there has been none so full of hope, of far-reaching good, as this Christlike work of arranging for the adoption of the five thousand five hundred little waifs who are now growing up under the charge of the missionaries of India. To every reader who has shared in the work by adopting one or more orphans, congratulation is due on the very satisfactory results so far reported.

The Home for Cuban Girls

The Home for Cuban Girls, 758 Quincy street, Brooklyn, conducted by Miss C. M. Strong-Selden, continues its good work for those who came under its care during Cuba's days of trouble, when so many of her people came to this country as refugees and a number of her orphans drifted here. There are twenty-five regular beneficiaries resident in the Home. The institution is supported by voluntary contributions, and Miss Selden writes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that a little aid would be most welcome now. Our readers are familiar with this work, to which at different times in the past they have lent kindly assistance.

THE FACE OF A CHILD

By ERNEST GILMORE

It was a hot summer morning. In the slums the heat was stifling. Little children moved about restlessly, seeking that which it was impossible to find—a cool spot. The open doorways and fire-escapes swarmed with them—poor little souls! On the shady side of the street they had taken possession of the gutter, and were playing there listlessly. Some had sought shelter from the scorching rays of the sun under a peddler's cart. It was not as hot there as in some other places, and they seemed thankful to be there—lying flat on their backs and laughing softly. Apparently they did not mind the heavy odor from the decaying fruit and vegetables, which the peddler was selling for what he could get. Sometimes the peddler threw out a banana or two which were too far gone to sell, and then—and then—it is shocking—but the children under the cart had a bite or two of fruit that had not quite reached the outermost limit of decay.

Ah the pity of it!

But, from these sordid surroundings, a band of children had just gone out with clean faces, neat clothing and expectant faces. Waifs from the slums, but, oh joy! with feet turned toward flowery fields—with hearts beating fast with longings for better days.

Just before the train started, a city missionary appeared, leading a wretched-looking little girl by the hand.

"I didn't discover the child until the last minute," she said, "so I only had time to wash her face."

"But there is no place engaged for her," one of the ladies in charge said, in gentle expostulation.

The city missionary smiled cheerfully.

"I've been praying for this little one all the way," she said, "and God is good. He will have a place for her—don't fret."

The look of exaltation on the pale, sweetly-serious face was the look of faith, it could not be ignored. The child was put on the car with the other fresh air children.

"Good-bye, dear," said the city missionary touching her lips to the waif's forehead, "God will care for you—don't be afraid."

"Where am I goin'?" in an awed whisper.

"To a beautiful place, my dear; where birds sing and roses bloom."

"To—to—heaven?" a light flitting across the poor little face. "Am I going there to—see—mamma?"

But there was no time to reply, the train was starting. It went, however, only a little way, and then backed—remaining a few minutes longer. During that interval the city missionary told Miss Abbie, one of the caretakers, a pathetic story in a few words. A little child of the poor! A young widow's only child! Born in the foul air of a basement in the slums! Reared in the attic—her only playground a miserable court with its atmosphere of decay! The terrible heat of summer! The bitter cold of winter! The pangs of hunger! The loneliness of the long days when her poor mother worked in the sweat-shop! Then—at last the sudden leave-taking! The hushed "Good-night, Louise, I'm on—my way—home—to—heaven. God—will—take—better—care—of—you—than—I—ever—could." (Speaking laboriously.) "I—wanted—to—care—for—you—but—I—had—to—try—to—keep—our—souls—and—bodies—together. Meet-me—in—the—morning—Louise. Good-night!"

It was late that same hot summer day, but the heat was not oppressive on the shady porch of an old-fashioned house set in the midst of "green things growing." An old man sat there in his old arm-chair, sometimes dozing, oftener looking outward wistfully. The garden was as old-fashioned as the house (and the people in it), but it was such a garden as would comfort and uplift a weary soul. The grass was not closely mown, according to modern methods, but was thick and fragrant, as grass will be when not molested continually. Amidst the grass were clumps of clover—white and purple—set gracefully in their emerald frames. Here and there a sweet "Johnnie Jump-up" held up its dear head shyly. Oh, the "Johnnie Jump-ups"—somehow, just to write about them fills my eyes with tears. The most beautiful pansy that ever bloomed could not touch my heart as could one wee "Johnnie Jump-up." Down by the picket fence, the "bleeding hearts" were all a-glow.

Ah, what a wealth of old-fashioned flowers, the dear fleur-de-luce, the gay peony, the canterbury bells, blue and white, ringing the story of auld-lang-syne, the bright phlox, the sweet calycanthus, the gorgeous tiger lilies, the sweet-williams, the grass pink, with its wonderful sweetness, the stately crown-imperial, the snowdrop, the monk's hood, the hollyhocks, all these and more were there in that dear old garden within sight of the old man's eyes. It seems as if he ought to have been satisfied, but he was not. He knew the picture spread before him was beautiful, but there was something lacking. The old man knew that it lacked. The birds sang. A gentle breeze waved the tree branches. The scent of flowers was everywhere, and yet—and yet—

A middle-aged woman appeared in the doorway. She had a good face, but it looked weary and discontented. "Come, father," she said kindly, "supper is ready."

The old man looked up with some impatience. "Where is Louise?" he said querulously. "Have you called her?"

"Oh, father!" she cried out, "are you going to keep that up forever?" and she bit her lip nervously.

Poor soul, she was so tired of those questions, to which there could not be any answer. Louise had been the light of the house for ten happy years. Five years had passed since she had suddenly been "called higher," but the old man, whose darling she had been, was still looking for her coming. She had been his only grandchild, and her mother—his favorite daughter—had died at her birth. She had been a charming child, and her sudden death darkened the old man's life and set the "wheels" going in his poor head. When his daughter asked him if he were "going to keep up those questions forever," he answered with some excitement: "I'll call her myself." A temporary physical strength came to him as he went down the winding walk to the gate.

"Louise!" he called, with all the vigor he could command: "Louise!"

There was no one in sight, but as he leaned on the gate waiting longingly for the sound of a "voice that was still," there came from the direction of "Four Corners" a team of horses bearing a wagon load of children. A gleam came into the anxious eyes.

"I guess Louise is in that wagon," was his glad thought, and his voice rang out clear and strong, as if it belonged to a young man: "Louise! Louise!"

The homeless waif in the wagon heard it, and a strange look came into her pale face, which would have moved a heart of stone. She set her teeth hard, and clenched her little thin hands, her eyes growing wide as if she were frightened. The birds were singing in the dear old yard. The child heard them, and she felt the breath of the flowers. They were getting nearer—nearer. Again—this time joyously, the voice rang out once more:

"Louise! Louise!"

"How strange!" said Miss Abbie, "I wonder who he is calling to."

A little hand touched hers. "He's calling to me," said the child, eagerly, her eyes shining. "Don't you hear him say

"Louise! Louise!" Please let me go to him, he wants me."

"Miss Abbie," explained the driver, in a low voice, "this old man is Mr. Morton, one of the best old men in the country, but—" putting his hand to his head suggestively, "he isn't exactly clear on all subjects since his little granddaughter died, some years ago."

As he reached the gate, the driver stopped his horses and the old man came outside. The waif scrambled out of the wagon, and in another moment her hand was closely clasped, and the old child and the new child were walking toward the house together.

"Is this—heaven?" the child asked, as her eyes took in the beauty of her surroundings.

The old man laughed joyously. "It seems so—doesn't it?" was his answer, "since you came home—you know. I've waited and waited—what made you so long coming?"

"Oh," said she, "I came as soon as I could—just as soon as the cars got to the station—we drove out, but I didn't know you were waiting. A little girl on the cars said maybe there wouldn't be any place for me, but there is—isn't there?"

"That little girl didn't know what she was talking about. I couldn't hardly wait for you—I couldn't hardly wait, but you're here now—you're here."

Meanwhile Miss Morton had hurried down another walk, and was at the lower gate listening to Miss Abbie's recital of the child's sad story.

"Leave the little one with us for the two weeks," the former said, ready and willing to lend a hand in the good work, "I'll take good care of her, and I am sure she will not lack for love—with father."

"Oh, how good of you!" exclaimed Miss Abbie. "But what about the child's clothes? It seems too much to ask you to furnish something, but those clothes she has on are only suitable for the rag-bag."

"Trust me for the clothes," Miss Morton said, with a smile, as she thought of the blue chest up-stairs filled with the dear lavender-scented garments of precious little Louise.

"I will, and God bless you for taking in the stranger at your door."

"It was father who took the 'stranger' in."

"God bless him, too. Two weeks from to-day I will be after Louise. Good-by."

"Good-by."

It was eight o'clock the same evening. The old man was on the porch thinking of Louise, when his daughter came out.

"You didn't find fault with the child—did you?" he inquired softly, as if someone might overhear.

"What should I find fault for?" she asked.

"You shouldn't," he said contentedly, "I only asked—you know. I suppose little Louise has been playing too hard—she's so thin and pale that she doesn't look quite natural. And did you notice her dress and shoes? All worn out—aren't they? But she has plenty of other clothes and shoes—you can throw these old things away."

"I have thrown them away, father, and to-morrow you will see her in dainty clothes and dear little red shoes and stockings."

Miss Morton smiled as she spoke, and the old man's face lit up as if a sunbeam had struck it.

"Then she'll look natural again," he said, "I didn't want to ask her how she got so tattered and torn for fear she'd think I was blaming her, dear child! I wouldn't blame her for the world—would you, Elizabeth?"

"No, father, I wouldn't blame her—I couldn't."

"What blue eyes she has," he continued, "blue as violets, and hair like sunshine; but I wonder who braided her hair—I don't like it so—it isn't natural."

"I have unbraided her hair, father, and I've brushed it until it shines. To-morrow I will curl it. I gave her a bath, too, and she is fast asleep."

"I'd like to see her," he said wistfully.

"Come then," was her answer. "It's your bedtime, and you can take a look at her on your way to your room."

It warmed the old man's heart just to look at her, sleeping so peacefully, with her unbound golden hair about her. There was a smile on her face and closely clasped within her hands—was a pink rose.

"Safe and happy," he murmured, "God is good to send Louise home."

"God is always good," said Elizabeth.

"We'll not let her stray away again, Elizabeth, will we?"

"No father, God helping us, we will not let her stray. She is ours to have and to keep."

Young Women Rebuild a Church

SEVERAL years ago, during a violent thunderstorm, lightning struck the steeple of the little Presbyterian Church at Larned, Kan. The steeple was set on fire, and so badly damaged that it was torn down, and, on account of the lack of funds, was not rebuilt. The church has a large membership of young ladies, who, about a year ago, decided to take matters in their own hands. A society, known as the "Presbyterian Chimers," was formed, with the idea of raising funds to rebuild the steeple and furnish it with a suitable bell. Long and unceasing have been their efforts, and now the work has been crowned with success. Sufficient money has been raised to begin the work, which will be completed as soon as possible. The funds were raised chiefly by socials and entertainments, and represent much individual work on the part of the young ladies.

Answered Prayers

M. D. T., Bedford, Ia., writes:

The shadow of a great trouble hung over me. I cried unto the Lord and he delivered me.

H. L. R., Seattle, Wash., writes:

God has answered prayer in the conversion of one of my children.

E. K., Spokane, Wash., writes:

I prayed for eight months for a certain thing, and God came to me one day when I did not expect it and answered my prayer. I have prayed for many special blessings since that, and God has heard and answered. Yes, God does answer prayers—does not always just in the way we want or when we want; but he is faithful to answer them just the way it is best for us.

W. G. J., Ochre, Va., writes:

We have a little boy who was deficient in mind, because of an attack of meningitis. He strayed from home a year ago last November. Friends helped us hunt the river and woods for three days. We feared he was drowned. We prayed to God that we might find him, and on the fourth day he was restored to us, active and well. He is now strong and healthy.

Mother, Hartford, Conn., writes:

For a long time I have been troubled, and earnestly have I prayed to my God. He has granted my request, and in a wonderful manner has shown to me that my prayer is answered. Glory and praise be to my God most high.

My soul, ask what thou wilt, Thou canst not be too bold; Since his own blood for thee he spilt, What else can he withhold?

OUR COMPLETE COURSE IN.... SHORTHAND

Isaac Pitman's 20th Century Revision

By Special Arrangement with Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, N. Y.

LESSON XVIII.

Vocalization of Pl and Pr.

157. The pl and pr series may sometimes be used to obtain a good outline, even though an accented vowel comes between the two consonants. In such a case the LONG dot vowels BETWEEN the two letters are expressed by a small circle BEFORE or ABOVE the consonant stroke; thus, chai, man, careless, cashiered, souvenir. The SHORT dot vowels are indicated by a small circle placed AFTER or UNDER the consonant; thus, dark, gnarl, German, girl.

158. In cases where it is inconvenient to observe this rule, the circle may be written on EITHER side, for either a LONG or SHORT vowel; thus, regard, engineer.

159. A stroke vowel or diphthong is struck THROUGH the consonant; thus, school, record, tincture.

160. Single stroke words vocalized in the above ways are halved for either t or d; thus, court.

161. When an initial hook or circle would interfere with a first-place vowel or diphthong, or a final hook or circle with a third-place vowel, the vowel-sign may be written at the BEGINNING or END of the consonant; as, child, dormouse, corporation, figuration, figures.

162. It is seldom necessary to vocalize the pl and pr series to mark an unaccented vowel; thus, permit, vocal; but accented vowels may be inserted; thus, pervert, pervert.

Exercise 52

1. Chaired, cheerily; charm, term, germ, pilgrim. 2. Regarded, veneer; foreshore, nurse, foolscap, fixture. 3. Cart, guard, cheered, bold, curt, gold, gird, partake. 4. Norman, torture, culture, dormant, direct, childish. 5. In order to shorten the journey, Mr. Blackmore went by way of Turkey, but as he proceeded in a very deliberate fashion, we feel sure that the experiment will not curtail it. 6. An energetic man, it may be supposed, should have reached the court a great deal sooner. 7. There might then have been no murmurs from those who had the courage to say that his action showed want of courtesy. 8. A sharp frost had caused a fracture in a culvert, and a road in that locality was flooded.

REVIEW.

1. How may the long dot vowels be indicated between the two letters of the pl and pr series of consonants? 2. How are the short vowels expressed in the same case? 3. When the position of the consonants renders it inconvenient to observe this rule, how may the vowel then be written? 4. How are the stroke vowels written, when occurring between the letters of the pl or pr series of consonants? 5. When a first-place vowel occurs between an initial hook or circle and the consonant to which the hook or circle is annexed; and when a third-place vowel occurs between a final hook or circle and the preceding consonant, how may these vowels be written?

W and Y Diphthongs

163. When w or y is followed by any simple vowel, a diphthong is formed, which is represented by a semicircle written in the same position as the simple vowel; thus,

ah aw wah yaw yah yaw
eh oh weh woh yeh yoh
ee oo wee woo yee yoo

The following are examples of the use of the above signs: zouave, railway, seaweed, chamois, misquote, Indiana, associate, yearly, so, lio, youth.

164. The same signs written LIGHT represent diphthongs formed of w and y and the SHORT vowels; thus, ä ö wä wö yä yö

ë ð wë wö yë yö
i j wî wî yî yî

The following are examples of the use of the above signs: thwack, twenty, twinge, memoir, password, lamb's-wool, serial, alien, atheist, patriot, pitious.

165. It is in practice rarely necessary to make any distinction between light and heavy signs. It will be seen that the SIDES of the circle represent ph the w diphthongs, while the upper and lower halves represent the y diphthongs.

166. The right semicircle o representing waw or wö may be prefixed to a stroke consonant where it is convenient; thus, walk, water, watcher, washer, war, warp.

167. The left semicircle o is prefixed to downward l, and the right semicircle o is prefixed to k, g, m, mp, to represent w only; thus, William, Wilson, wake, wig, woman, wampum. This sign is always read first, so that when a vowel precedes w the stroke must be written, and not the abbreviation, thus awake, wake.

168. At the beginning of a word, the vowel aw may be joined to upward l, as awl, alter, alteration; and the logogram

aw, (all) may be joined in compound words commencing with all- or al-; thus, Almighty, already, almost, all-wise.

At this stage of his study the student should read as much shorthand as possible, for practice in reading is second only in importance to practice in writing shorthand. It is in this respect that the student of the Isaac Pitman system has so great an advantage over writers of other systems, there being more shorthand literature in the Isaac Pitman system than will be found in all others combined. The intelligent reading of well-written shorthand is to the brain of the thorough student what the landscape is to the artist. For this purpose the student is recommended to purchase Esop's Fables, or Easy Readings, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand. Either of these works will be sent postpaid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orlers should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XIX., will appear in the issue of Sept. 17.

A Congregation's Prayer Answered

Miss Bessie R—, a Philadelphia reader of this journal, sends the following interesting incident:

Several years ago, the congregation of a small Baptist Church in that city, having outgrown their accommodations, decided to move to a large building a few squares off. The old church was pulled down by the purchaser and a fine building erected, which was soon occupied as a notorious dance hall, wine room, and gambling den. This greatly shocked the congregation, who had worshipped at that spot for many years, and who regarded it with some degree of veneration. They prayed over it, but were powerless to do anything personally. Not long afterward the liquor license was revoked. Next, the city bought the building and used it as a public kindergarten and free library, so that to-day, where drunkards formerly used to linger, young innocent children are receiving the lessons in life's duties. In an upper room of the building, religious meetings are frequently held. The faithful ones, who mourned and prayed over the matter, see in this wonderful transformation an answer to their earnest petitions to a prayer hearing and answering God.

WALKING BY FAITH

I KNOW not what awaits me,
Be it smiles or maybe tears;
But I'll trust my Heavenly Father,
Be it days or even years.
He knows the path before me,
He will guide my trembling feet;
I'll await with joy, not sorrow,
Till I my Saviour meet.
For I know there is no delusion,
Faith is my guiding star;
I will trust and believe and never more grieve
While watching the light afar.

FOR A NATIONAL REVIVAL HERE

THERE are indications that a great wave of spiritual revival is about to sweep over the Presbyterian Church in America. Within the last twelve months between 12,000 and 15,000 new members have been added to the church on confession of faith, thus effectually "turning the tide" and reversing the record of preceding years, which have shown a decline in the general membership.

The Presbyterian Church's National Committee on Evangelistic work, created by the General Assembly, in Philadelphia, a year ago, and continued by the last Assembly, has had this important subject under discussion at its Annual Conference, at Winona Lake. John H. Converse, of Philadelphia, the Chairman, and Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., of New York, the Secretary, with the most noted men in the church, both East and West, participated in that conference.

The centre of interest hinges on plans to raise at once $150,000 to carry out the plans of a National Campaign during the next twelve months. The preliminary work during the past year has all been paid for out of the $25,000 contributed by John H. Converse last year. He announces that he has placed a second $25,000 to the account of the Committee, and it is proposed to raise $100,000, by finding one hundred Presbyterians who will each give $1,000, and the balance through other channels.

Dr. Chapman, the National Secretary, reports that the experimental and preliminary work during the past year has resulted in a hopeful change in the Presbyterian Church, whose membership, instead of growing, had reached the point of stagnation. As a result of the last year's campaign, which was centralized in Iowa, Indian Territory, Michigan, Indiana, Colorado, California, Kansas, Nebraska, New Jersey, and Montana, between 12,000 and 15,000 confessions of faith and accessions to the church can be directly traced to the work, and that is just about the total increase shown by the church during the past year. What has been done in certain parts of these few States and Territories, he believes, may be duplicated in every State and Territory in the Union.

It is intended that all the effective evangelists in this country, and in the foreign English-speaking countries, shall be engaged for the coming year. During the past year the experiment of doing evangelistic work in the Indian Territory missions has proven very effective.

"The Presbyterians are now ready for aggressive movements all over the country," Secretary Chapman said. "The General Assembly thinks this the most effective method to employ. We are now ready to call for the sinews for great effort, with the assurance that we can produce good results. If we have been able to turn the tide and bring such a multitude into the fold during the past year, at a cost of a little over $17,000, what can we expect to do when we are given the support of one hundred men, who will not only give $1,000 each, to add to what Mr. Converse has given, but who will also become actively interested in the movement?"

"We propose to send out the best men in the country, even to those that cannot bear the expense of their local meetings. It is to be an effective and aggressive campaign from beginning to end; we hope to bring about a revival such as the Presbyterian Church in America has not seen in years."

in the great desire on the part of the people to "know Christ." At every meeting a deep spiritual power was perceptibly present, and audiences were extraordinarily responsive and sympathetic under the Gospel message.

Perhaps the most remarkable of all the many unusual scenes in this great revival was the meeting which took place in Exhibition Hall, Melbourne, May 24, under the auspices of the Simultaneous Mission. Admission was by ticket, and long before the time of beginning service, the immense hall was packed, about eight thousand persons being present. Dr. Torrey was the principal speaker. Mr. Alexander, the singing-evangelist, had a large choir and the song service was superb. When, at a point of intense interest in his address, Dr. Torrey called upon all who had been converted during the meetings to stand, it seemed as though the whole of the vast assemblage rose. A conservative estimate showed over six thousand thus publicly avowing conversion since the present revival began. A further question from Dr. Torrey elicited the fact that some three thousand of the new converts had already applied for church membership, and a third interrogation brought to their feet the other half of the whole body of converts, with the announcement that they intended applying for membership without delay.

It was a glorious and inspiring sight to witness these thousands of men and women, of all ages and social conditions, thus openly avowing their new-found faith in Christ, as Saviour and Redeemer.

Altogether, the Australian revival has been characterized by scenes of wonderful power in so many localities that to chronicle them would be an impossible task. Dr. Torrey preached with irresistible force and eloquence, and with a directness in his appeal such as is rarely heard, even in revivals. It was a common vent for fully half the audiences to stay or the "after meetings." Friend led friend and neighbor led neighbor forward in these after meetings. Deeply impressed it was to observe the solicitude of the converts for the unconverted, and their joy when the latter at last surrendered and found peace.

At latest advices the revival was still in progress, without any abatement in popular interest, and additional multitudes were being added to the Christian Church throughout Australia.

PREACHER'S CHILDREN

Same as Others.

The wife of a prominent divine tried the food remedy with her little daughter. She says, "I feel sure that our experience with Grape-Nuts food would be useful to many mothers. Our little daughter, eight years old, was subject to bowel trouble which we did not then understand and which the doctor's prescription failed to relieve."

We had been using different cereals for breakfast and finally becoming discouraged I said, "I will try an experiment, I will discard all other cereals and use only Grape-Nuts for breakfast." The three children all like it better than anything else and are so fond of it that I hardly let them have all they want. In a short time I could see an improvement in the bowel trouble.

We began using Grape-Nuts five months ago and now not only has the bowel trouble disappeared but the child has grown so plump and well—in fact was never so fleshy before—that all our friends notice and remark about it. We think we have a ideal breakfast which consists of whole wheat bread with butter, Postum Cereal Coffee and Grape-Nuts. This is all we care for and I think it would be hard to find many families so invariably healthy as is ours." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

DON'T TRY PRESSURE.

Trust To Intelligence.

You cannot by process of law prevent anyone from drugging themselves to death. We must meet the evil by appeal to the intelligence.

One of the drugs that does the most harm to Americans, because of its wide spread use and its apparent innocence, is Coffee. Ask any regular coffee drinker if he or she is perfectly well. At least one-half are not. Only those with extra vigor can keep well against the daily attack of caffeine (in the coffee). The heart and pulse gradually lose strength; dyspepsia, kidney troubles and nervous diseases of some sort set in and the clearly marked effects of coffee poisoning are shown. These are facts and worth anyone's thoughts. The reasonable and sensible thing, is to leave it off and shift to Postum Food Coffee. The poison that has been secretly killing is thus withdrawn and a powerful rebuilding agent put to work. The good effects will begin to show inside of 10 days. If health and comfort are worth anything to you, try it.

DELIGHT IN GOD'S HOUSE*

Felt Only by Those Who Really Love Him and Seek His Presence

HOW impressive to a Hebrew must have been the Tabernacle and the Temple! Their prophets had told them that they must not conceive of any house that they could build containing God, but when they saw the cloud, indicative of the divine presence, resting on their sacred place of worship, they must have felt the awful sanctity of the house of God. To many, doubtless, the sense of awe would outbalance every other feeling, and they would say with Jacob, "How dreadful is this place!" The consciousness of sin and imperfection would make them shrink from entering even into its outer courts. But there were others to whom, as to the writer of the eighty-fourth Psalm, there was no place on earth so delightful. His remarks imply that owing to sickness, or some other cause, he was unable to be present there, and he mourns. It is then that the comforting thought enters his mind that there is a blessedness higher even than participating in the Temple services. Blessed is the man who is in the Temple courts, but still more blessed is he whose soul is a temple, in whose heart are the ways of God. It is he with whom God dwells, who longs most for his visible house; yet it is he who, when deprived of the privilege, is best able to bear the deprivation.

The modern Christian is in the same condition. He who lives nearest to God takes the greatest delight in the services of the church, and they who have the greatest need of the blessings to be found there are they who find the services uncongenial and a weariness. We do well to try to get the non-churchgoer to attend church, because it is there that there is the most likelihood of his conversion taking place; but even when he does accept the invitation, he derives no pleasure from the services until his heart has been changed. He cannot understand what the real Christian can find in them to give him pleasure. He may be interested by the sermon, may find intellectual enjoyment in the eloquence or the logical arguments of the preacher or in the music, but the worship, the praise, the communion with God, which are the essence of the service to the earnest, devout Christian, are incomprehensible to him. Delight in God's house because it is God's house can be felt only when the spirit has been attuned to the nature of God. The fact involves no mystery. There are many persons who would find it very dreary to spend an evening in the society of artists, whose sole topic of conversation is art, and yet, to an artist, no company would be so congenial. So with politics, with fishing or hunting, the bent of a person's mind determines the pleasure he will derive from the society he enters.

It would be well if we seriously asked ourselves the question, Why we go to church? In the Roman Catholic churches and in the Mohammedan mosques of the East men may be seen, who evidently derive benefit and comfort from being there, though they may stay but a few minutes, which they spend in prayer. They enter with spiritual burdens, which seem lighter when they leave. We look upon such conduct as superstitious, yet there may be a wisdom in it that we fail to use, in seeking divine help in every trial. We could read the Bible and pray and perhaps sing hymns and read a sermon in the privacy of our own homes instead of going to church, but how much of the delight of a service would be missed to the sincere worshiper. The being in a place where we have felt the presence of God in time past, the consciousness of being among others who are seeking him, too, the hallowed sense of nearness to him—all these join to make the public service a means of grace to the soul. The sordid pursuits of daily life, the associations with evil and contact with temptation need an antidote that is found nowhere so surely as in the place where God is worshiped and where he manifests himself to the seeking soul.

HEART RELIGION

Neither Race nor Church-Connection alone Sufficient for Salvation

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE awful delusion of the Roman Catholics and of the Greek Church, that they who belong to their church will be saved, whether their hearts are changed or not, a delusion which is similar to the Brahmin dependence upon caste, and the Mohammedan dependence upon their observances, was evidently present among the people whom Moses had led and in his last address to them (Deut. 30: 11-20), he shows them that it is a bridge of straw, for God looks upon the heart. "The Lord will not pardon such a man, but shall blot out his name from under heaven... and separate him unto evil (Deut. 29: 16-20 R.V.). And the generation to come shall ask, when they see God's judgment also upon the land: "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger? Then men shall say: Because they forsook the covenant of the Lord... therefore the anger of the Lord was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curse that is written in this book" (verses 22-27 R.V.). The land and the people are blest or cursed together (Ezek. 36).

And Moses went on to tell them that when all these things should have come upon them, the blessing and the curse, and they should call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord their God had driven them, and they should return to him and obey him, they and their children, with all their heart and soul,—then the Lord would turn their captivity and gather them from all the peoples whither he had scattered them. Not even one of their "outcasts" should be forgotten, God would bring them from the uttermost part of heaven... And he would do them good, and multiply them above their fathers, and would circumcise their heart and the heart of their seed, to love him with all their hearts, and with all their soul, that they might live.

The question may arise: How could they thus turn to the Lord, and love, serve and obey him, if he had not given them "a heart to know, and eyes to see, and ears to hear?" Could they be expected to do what they had no power of themselves to do? This is the great question which stands before every human being. Adam and Eve in a state of innocence fell under Satan's temptation. Why? Not because they were sinful, but because they dealt with Satan in their own strength instead of depending upon God and referring all to him. Where they failed, our beloved Lord, in our nature, conquered. He "was tempted in all points like as we are" Heb. 4: 5). After the fall, men went into all lengths of sin, not because there was no help for it, but because they did not do what Noah and Enoch in their day did do: they did not depend upon and walk with God. The children of Israel had the manifest presence of God in the pillar of cloud and fire; their life was a miracle, and his written laws with them. But their hearts were not changed, except when they voluntarily and personally yielded themselves to God. Moses, Joshua, Caleb and others did this; but the people, with all these advantages, went into all the depths of sin, and are scattered over the earth.

Moses testified to the people, "For this commandment which I command thee this day is not too hard for thee" (Deut. 32). God would be neither a true Father nor a just Judge, if he exacted an impossible obedience. His condemnation never is that we are born in sin. He never makes us responsible for the sin of Adam, or for our fallen nature. But "this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, but men loved darkness more than light, and refused him" (John 3: 18). "The Life was the Light of men"—Christ, in his death for us, and by his life in us when we believe, is the true and perfect remedy for sin. Atonement and pardon for sin committed, and new life for the cure of sin, takes, as we trust 'him, the place of the old corrupt life which we cannot alter. Who then can say that God is unjust? Who can but wonder, adore, and yield to him when such a salvation is brought near to him?

If I Could Meet You Face to Face

and explain why the Swoboda System is different and better than any other and infinitely superior to drugs and medicines I know you would be convinced, and being convinced that I can turn lassitude into energy; feebleness into strength; ill health into robust health; mental sluggishness into activity, and insomnia into sound, healthful sleep, by my system, you would place yourself under my direction. To simmer the matter down to its lowest terms, I haven't a doubt but thousands of intelligent men and women who really need my help to restore normal conditions have read my advertisements time and again and would have long ago adopted my system had they believed that what I claim is true.

If you have any doubt on the subject, I want you to write me saying so, and I'll send you a long list of names and addresses of men and women who have developed perfect manhood and womanhood by the use of my system; people who are above the breath of suspicion—clergymen, professional men and women and honorable business men. More than this, I will send you the postage to write to as many of these people as you care to, and postage to enclose for a reply.

Don't take my word—I'm prejudiced.

I know and I want you to know that my system, if followed faithfully, first relieves the human organism of poison and impurities by producing healthy digestion and assimilation, and after that revitalizing the exhausted nerves, sending rich, red blood coursing and tingling to every capillary and extremity, puts good, sound muscle where muscle is needed, removes fat, gives erectness of carriage and springiness and grace to the walk—stimulates and builds up the tired brain, paints the cheek with the flush of robust health; builds up, and in fact fits man, woman or child to Nature's perfect mold. I can do all this for you, as I have for hundreds of others, because my system is based on Nature's laws—the results are as natural and inevitable as the cycle of the planets.

Mr. C. O. Prouse, a leading attorney of Hopkinsville, Ky., writes under date of October 5, 1901:

"Allow me to thank you for your kindness for the past two months and for your instructions, which have been to me one of the richest blessings that I have ever received. At the time of beginning your exercises I was simply a nervous wreck—suffered intensely with indigestion and kindred ailments; was easily overtaxed when attempting work of any kind, and seemed almost impossible to recuperate without leaving off for months all mental and physical labor; but, thanks to you, I was enabled, without medicine of any description (something I had not done for over two years), to keep up my work and at the same time increase my weight and general health. until now—only two months—I feel like a new man; am now healthy, strong and tireless. Now I do not know how to be tired, as the exercise you give seems to rest me instead of tiring—it acts like a stimulant to a tired body.

"It does me a great deal of good to say that I have forgotten the taste of 'pepsin' and such other medicines for a weak stomach or digestive organs, and that I eat anything I want. I can heartily recommend your system of exercise to anyone that desires a good physical condition—a condition that when the mind is tired and needs the night's rest, restful sleep will be his reward.

"I will take pleasure in answering any correspondence that will in any wise help you along the road to success and some unfortunate to the road of health."

I have no book, no chart, no apparatus whatever. My system is for each individual; my instructions for you would be just as personal as if you were my only pupil. It is taught by mail only and with perfect success, requires but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart. I shall be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, together with testimonial letters from pupils.

BIBLE CONFERENCE AT WINONA LAKE

The Famous Indiana Resort this Year the Scene of a Great Assembly of Eminent Christian Teachers

ONE of the most remarkable Religious Conferences of the year, important both as to numbers and the influence of the meetings, was the Bible Conference held at Winona Lake, Ind., during the latter weeks of August. It is estimated that not less than fifteen hundred clergymen and evangelists were present, and took part in the deliberations on the vital religious subjects on the programme. This was the eighth of these annual conferences, each of which been renewed consecration, friendly converse and an earnest effort to learn more of the will of God. They spoke of the season of retirement, as people have been accustomed to speak of their sojourns at Northfield. Others desiring such a blessing listened and went to the next Conference, and so the numbers grew to the present imposing aggregate.

Winona Lake is an ideal place for a summer retreat. On the shores of a beautiful sheet of water, surrounded public buildings, a perfect Chautauqua, covering study geographical, historical, scientific, as well as athletics, is provided, and the arrangements are so made that the visitor can devote his stay to a variety of pursuits. Lecture courses on a large variety of subjects are arranged, with special instruction in music and singing. Added to all these attractions is the Bible Conference, under the leadership of theologians, pastors and Christian workers, whose names are known the world over. It is

has surpassed its predecessor in the numbers attending and the enthusiasm of the gatherings. The first of them, held in 1895, consisted of just thirty-five persons. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman of New York, had taken up the work of organizing the conference with reluctance, and only on the urgent request of Dr. S. C. Dickey, the General Manager of the Winona Assembly, who, at Dr. D. L. Moody's suggestion, went to the revival meetings Dr. Chapman was holding in Indianapolis, to enlist his services. It was a small beginning, but it had in it the elements of growth; the locality was delightful, the Chautauqua held in the grounds was successful, the spirit of the people was cordial, and the principles adopted were of the most liberal character. Above all things there was the manifest presence of the Holy Spirit quickening all hearts. People, when they came away, were conscious of having received a blessing, there had by four hundred acres of superb forest land on hill and valley, a delightfully cool, bracing atmosphere, an abundance of sparkling mineral water, are the natural advantages which taste and skill have turned to the best account, by the art of the landscape gardener and the triumphs of the horticulturist's powers. Excellent accommodations are provided for the transient visitor, and about a thousand families have erected summer homes in this Western paradise. In the commodious this Conference that has now initiated the movement, which as men in all our States are now praying, may lead to a widespread revival of religion.

The Conference this year commenced on August 17, with a morning Prayer Service at 6.30 A.M., at which the large chapel was well filled, notwithstanding the early hour of its assembling. At nine o'clock there was a model Sunday School, at which Capt. F. F. McCrea presided. About one thousand persons were present, and took part in the study. At eleven o'clock Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman preached the Conference Sermon from the text Genesis 35:3: "Let us rise and go up to Bethel."

It was an earnest appeal to renewed consecration, and to the renunciation of all habits and indulgences which were liable to become hindrances to the Holy Spirit's work in the soul. It was necessary, Dr. Chapman argued, to recall the Bethel

LEPROUS SIN

TEXT, II. Kings 5: 1

"BUT HE WAS A LEPER"

THE best blood in all Europe flows into the army. The keenest of brains are covered by the soldier's cap. The peasantry are overtaxed and brow-beaten, and flung under the iron heel of oppression, in order that the gilt-laced officer, who is the scion of an aristocratic family, may have a soft couch upon which to sleep, and a clean-limbed thoroughbred upon which to cavort, while he salutes the reviewing officer during dress-parade. Every civilian is at the beck and call of the military; from the innkeeper's daughter, flirting with the sergeant or the young corporal, up to the princess, smiling at the favorite staff-officer of her father, the king. The German shopkeeper will turn his back upon you in an instant if the clank of the sword is heard and the glitter of the shoulder-strap is seen in the doorway. On account of this foolish adoration by a cringing populace, the foreign officer or private soldier has grown arrogant and conceited and snobbish and supercilious and petulant and spoilt.

The Syrian nation was a military nation, with all that the word implies, and Captain Naaman was the Commander-in-Chief of all its armies, the headquarters of which were to be found in the Damascus capital. But Naaman wielded a higher influence than that which belongs even to the greatest soldier of a military kingdom. The phrase used by the inspired historian, "a great man with his master, and honorable," implies that he held a position more powerful in the kingdom than the head of the Privy Council, the Prime Minister, or the Secretary of State, or Secretary of the Treasury, and he may have held, through the prestige of his military successes, some or all of these offices in his own person, as great Pashas often do in Oriental lands. He occupied practically the same position in the Damascus capital that the Duke of Wellington occupied after the Battle of Waterloo. The Duke of Wellington, by the overthrow of the Napoleonic dynasty, not only became the Prime Minister of England, but for a while the most influential statesman in all Europe. Naaman had in Damascus an influence similar to that of Julius Caesar when he returned to Rome from his foreign victories, or which Napoleon held in the French nation when he was First Consul, as well as the commander of the French legions. Naaman was as mighty in influence as was the French Cardinal who used to overawe his king in the council chamber, when he would stamp up and down the room, crying, "It shall be done! I say it shall be done! I am Richelieu who says it, and it shall be done." And when the great French statesman would thus speak, the frightened king dared not answer a word.

Brilliant Misery

But after I have shown you Naaman's fame and power in the Syrian nation; after I have figuratively piled stone upon stone, and height upon height, and mountain upon mountain in setting forth this pyramid of human greatness; the whole structure tumbles into ruins when I speak the words of my text. I bring the mightiest human influence of the East down to the lowest depths of earthly misery. I bring Naaman down from his high pedestal, until even the poor beggar in the street might have cause to pity him. I bring him down until not one physically well man in all the world, no matter how low he might be in the social scale, would exchange places with him. Naaman was a prince. Naaman was a mighty military potentate, a statesman, a ruler. He was practically greater than a king, "but he was a leper."

The disease of leprosy has often been Biblically used as the symbol of sin.

It is a most impressing and appalling symbol. We in America cannot realize all that is implied by comparing any man's spiritual condition to this horrible disease. In the far East, I have seen with loathing some of the awful ravages of this disease. I would describe in symbol some of the horrors of sin by telling what my own eyes have seen, and what my own ears have heard, among those poor creatures physically doomed.

Leprosy, humanly speaking, is an incurable disease. Scientists, ever since history began, have been studying the onward march of this fatal destroyer. Although most prevalent in the East, it is confined to no climate, and is peculiar to no age, race, or condition. Nearly two thousand years before Christ was born in Bethlehem, we read that Miriam, who led the Hebrew maidens in the triumphant dance, when Pharaoh's host was submerged in the Red Sea, was afflicted with leprosy, because she became sinfully jealous. Miriam was jealous because her brother Moses, eighty years of age, fell in love and wanted to take a wife. Clear back in 1516, Holbein, the artist, painted a picture of Elizabeth distributing bread to the unclean lepers of Augsburg. Lepers among the icebergs of the North! Lepers basking in the torrid heats about the Equator! Lepers in Europe! Lepers in Asia! Lepers in Africa! Lepers in America! Lepers in the islands of the seas! But though leprosy has been found by the scientists everywhere, yet one fact is universally recognized about the disease—it is incurable. A man who has the leprous poison in his system has no hope from medicine; he must grow worse and worse until he comes to the grave. It is as incurable as that disease which we call cancer, and which is only a little less fatal in its hideous and repulsive results than leprosy. When General Grant was suffering from an affection of the throat, the family physicians feared a cancer. But to be upon the safe side in their diagnosis, they took to a specialist a small part of the excrescence from the throat. "Now," the doctors said to that specialist, "this excrescence is from a man of very great national influence. We will not tell you his name, as it might bias your judgment." The specialist placed the excrescence under the microscope. After carefully examining it he said—"It is a fatal cancer. Who's throat did it come from?" "General U. S. Grant's," was the answer. "Then," said the great bacteriologist, "General Grant is doomed. He must die."

Spiritual Disease

How terrible are these diseases that physicians confess themselves unable to cure! How startling then is the divine statement that the soul may be afflicted with such a disease, similarly beyond human medication. Sin is a leprosy. Sin is the cancer of the soul gnawing at its vitals. Sin is the forerunner of eternal death. There are men to-day within the sound of my voice who, in their own strength, have been fighting sin for the last twenty or thirty years. But as you grow weaker, the power of your sin is growing stronger. God have pity upon you, for you are a doomed leper. You are doomed by leprous sin.

But though from our standpoint leprosy is incurable, yet the leprous scales were cleansed by a divine power. Therefore it is to Christ, and to Christ alone, that we must look for the cure of sin. The moral leper may go with confidence to Christ, who cured the physical lepers by a word. When the ten lepers came to the Saviour pleading for help, Christ turned and said, "Go show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass as they went, they were cleansed." Naaman, the great captain, was helpless in the hands of his human physicians. On account of his wealth and fame, Naaman—like General Grant afflicted with cancer—must have had the best doctors the royal court of Damascus could summon. But when Naaman, obedient to the divine command through Elisha, went and dipped seven times in the River Jordan, his flesh became like the flesh of a little child. Oh, my brother and sister, you who are cursed with leprous sin, will you not come to the Divine fountain? Will you not bathe in Christ's blood? Will you not to-day by the Calvary Cross seek supernatural medication?

Leprosy may take a very long time in which to fatally develop, although such is not always the way the disease progresses. Sometimes the scourge in a few months may change a beautiful body into a hideous corpse. But the quick result is the exception and not the rule. At this first touch of leprosy, usually there may only be a hardness, or rather a numbness, of the skin, in a spot about the size of a ten-cent piece. The skin at that one place merely turns as white as snow. If you know nothing about the disease, you may not worry about it. You may, for a long time, be indifferent to the numbness. Then, some day when you are in a physician's office seeking advice for some other cause, you may turn to the doctor and say: "By the way, doctor, I have a very peculiar something the matter with my hand. It does not hurt me, but it is numb in one place." Then the physician with a grave face will look at your hand. Then he will take a pin out of the lapel of his coat and prick that spot. Then he will turn and say, "You are a leper! You are already doomed, although death may be many years away."

An Afflicted Child

When going through one of the leper hospitals of Calcutta, I saw standing in one of the wards, a beautiful flaxen-haired baby boy. He was only about six or seven years of age. He was one of the healthiest looking, and prettiest children I ever saw. He was the son of an English soldier. He was such a lovely boy, and while his great big eyes were looking at me, he was standing there with his thumb in his mouth, sucking it as some of us perhaps have sucked our thumbs when we were children. I turned and said to the lovely boy, "Why are you here?" "Got the disease," he answered. "Where," said I, as the great tears began to rain down my cheeks. The lad raised one of his pretty bare legs. Then, pointing to the ball of his foot, he said, "There it is." As I looked, I could hardly keep back my sobs. I saw in the ball of his foot, the fatal white mark. It was like a beautiful snowflake. The child was doomed. He was a leper!

But though leprosy may come in a seemingly harmless way, the disease for four, five, ten, even fifteen years, will keep on steadily spreading. It will spread until the fingers fall off from the hands, and the toes from the feet. It will keep on spreading until the skin bloats and cracks and the hair falls out. So, leprous sin, coming in a seemingly harmless way, will keep on spreading, until it makes the face hideous, the body deformed. It may keep on spreading for years, until at last the fatal leprous sin will destroy the body as well as the soul.

It is related that a young English artist, desiring to paint the figure of "Innocence," used as a model the face of a lovely little child. The eyes, the lips, and the smile of his model were the most beautiful he ever saw. All England came to admire the picture. Many years afterward, when the artist had attained to great fame, he decided to paint a companion picture to the one he had painted in his youth. He wanted to call the companion picture "Depravity." He wandered up and down the London slums, until at last he found a hideous-looking mortal. A man who seemed to be a monster without a soul. After the artist had used this hideous model and finished his companion picture, he found to his astonishment that the two models were the same. The model of "Depravity" was the once beautiful child, who had become depraved by the fatal disease of leprous sin which had wrought the horrible transformation in face and figure, in body and soul. So, my brother, though this disease of leprous sin may take many years to develop, yet it will surely permeate the mind and soul, until both perish in horrible and loathsome corruption.

The Danger of Infection

Leprosy is an infectious disease. It is infectious as the scarlet fever germ is infectious. It is spread throughout a community only by the leprous germ of one physical body being brought into contact with another physical body, when the latter is in a condition favorable for the development of that leprous germ. Thus, in the leprosy house established in New Brunswick, Canada, in 1865, it was found by investigation that every one of the ninety patients confined within that leprous hospital had contracted the disease of leprosy within a radius of seventy miles from the point where the first case of Canadian leprosy was discovered. Convinced of its infectious character, Dr. Emerson, who was for many years in the employ of the Hawaiian Government, gave as his testimony that it is utterly useless to fight the leprous disease in any other way than by isolation. "To experiment," said he, "with this scourge, on any other theory than the infectious theory is dangerous, reckless insanity." Prof. James C. White, in the American Journal of Medical Sciences, gave practically the same advice.

To isolate the lepers of the Hawaiian Islands, Molokai, the leper reservation for the islands of the Pacific, was established. In the Holy Land, the Jews and Gentiles alike drive their own leprous kith and kin from their sides into isolation. They exclude them from the cities and the towns. As you travel through the East, those lepers, some with their arms and teeth gone, some on crutches, some sightless, some with cracked and bleeding lips, come down the mountain side, and in hoarse, piping voices, beg for food and money. It seems to be a very heartless method thus to isolate the lepers, but the Orientals say, "Better that a few men and women starve and die: better that a few infectious lepers be exiled from civilization, than that a whole community sicken and be destroyed."

The poet has well described the isolation of the infectious lepers in the East, lest the rest of the community might be stricken:

"Room for the leper, room," and as he came,
The cry passed on, "Room for the leper, room."
And he went forth alone, not one of all
The many whom he loved, nor she whose name
Was woven in the fibres of his heart, to come and speak Comfort unto him. Yea, he went forth his way
Sick, and heartbroken, and alone to die,
For God had cursed the leper.

As the disease of leprosy is fatally infectious, so are the leprous germs of sin. The evil which is within us very apt to become the evil which shall dwell within them. The wrongs we do against our own selves, are apt to become the sins which others shall do unto themselves also. And as this infection implies that to scatter the germs of sin, we must come in contact with others, is it not a startling reflection, that the people whom we are most liable to destroy by our sins, are those who may be nearest and dearest to us? It will be the mother, herself stricken with the leprosy of sin, who will destroy her own daughter; the father, his own son; the brother, his own brother; the wife, her sister. Kindred ties and companionship will only serve to facilitate the transmission of the deadly infection. Therefore should we not feel as did Robert E. Lee when he was one winter morning walking over the mounds of Arlington. As he looked back, he saw his twenty-year-old boy trying to stretch his legs to step in his father's tracks. Then said the greatest man the South has produced for many a year: "If my boy is going to try to walk in the path I am walking in, I must be very careful that I always walk in the path of purity, and truth, and honor, and right." If our dear ones, those closest to us in life, are those most in danger of infection from our spiritual leprosy; there is another reason why, for their sakes, if not for our own, we should seek the divine germicide, to have the cleansing which Naaman, the leper received, when, at God's command, he dipped even times in the River Jordan, and his flesh became like unto that of a little child.

Ruined by Example

May none of us ever experience the remorse a broken-hearted father felt many years ago. He was bending over the bleeding body of his only son, who had just been brought home in a dying condition from a drunken brawl. "Oh, my child," he cried, "Why did you do this? Why have you broken your mother's and father's hearts?" The dying boy cruelly looked up into the face of his weeping parent, and answered: "Why, father, what are you crying for? I am dying as the result of your sins, as well as mine. You first taught me to drink at our own table. You are as much to blame as I." Yes, the infectious results of your own leprosy sins are evidenced in the temporal and eternal destruction of those who ought to be nearest and dearest to our affectionate hearts.

Leprosy is to be found in the homes of the rich and the poor alike: in the palace and in the hovel: at the king's banquet table, as well as in the beggars' gutter. For many years, the world supposed that leprosy was able to thrive only in the pestilential alleys and filthy dens of the East. That supposition was totally wrong. Leprosy may originally start among the low social outcasts, but the leprosy germs can live and thrive under the dazzling lights of a brilliant ball-room, as well as in the stifling air of the dark hovel of criminals' retreat. By handling the coin which is publicly used in India, a traveler may become infected with leprosy, some leper having handled the same coin. By simply touching a rock, at the foot of which a leprosy beggar had crouched, a prince, arrayed in all the brilliant robes of royalty, may become a leper. A few years ago, the most influential man of the king's court in the Sandwich Islands was supposed to be an eccentric individual, because he always wore a glove upon his left hand. But one day, that courtier was compelled to take off his kid glove, and he was found to be a leper. The wealthiest merchant of all India spent the last ten years of his life immured in a dreary Calcutta hospital for lepers. I do not know how those leprosy germs were able to reach that rich merchant of India, but reach him they did. I saw him after he had spent nearly eight years as an inmate of a leper hospital. He sat with a pair of gold spectacles upon his nose, his two legs gone, his two hands gone, and with an open Bible upon his bed, the pages of which he had to turn with his protruding, bloated tongue. And I saw him fed from a spoon by a nurse, for he was practically as helpless as a new-born babe. Yes, the awful leprosy germs can thrive among the rich as well as among the poor. They can pass through the doors of a palace, even though the doors may be bolted with unbreakable bars of steel: even though the doors of the rich man's house may be locked with golden keys.

The last people on earth to believe that they can be destroyed by the leprosy germs of sin are the rich, the affluent, and the honored. It is easy enough to persuade the poor outcast, despised for her sins by the whole human race, that she needs Christ. It is easy enough to persuade the poor drunkard, writhing in the fatal clasp of delirium, that he needs supernatural aid. But oh, it is hard to persuade the rich man, the honored, the respectable man, to feel that the leprosy germs of sin may be imbedded in his own flesh.

Divine Medicament

Affluence and worldly honor sometimes seem to make men indifferent to all that is vital for time and eternity. They are blinded to their sins, and scoff at the warning that their own fate may yet be that of the multitudes who, in the palaces of the rich and the great, have perished from the same indifference.

Reckless and indifferent was the attitude of the people of London during the great plague about two centuries ago. Ainsworth, the historian, tells us that during those harrowing and gruesome months, the London stores were nearly all closed. The doors of the private homes were nearly all barred and bolted save when they were opened at the approach of the bell-ringer who was seated upon a pile of stenchful corpses, because he was out driving the dead cart and collecting the different bodies of the dead. Yet at that time in London there were men and women who whistled and laughed and danced and sang and blasphemed under the very shadow of these horrors. The noted wine cellars of the aristocratic homes were broken into and rifled. The churches and the cathedrals were robbed of their pews and pulpits and turned into dance halls. There the young men and the young women would carouse during the long hours of the night and day as though this awful plague would never strike them. So there are men and women, spiritual lepers living in the homes of the rich and poor alike, who are as utterly indifferent to the approach of eternal death caused by sin as were some of the inhabitants of England during the wholesale slaughter of human life in the Great London Plague of about two centuries ago.

But though the leprosy of the soul, like the leprosy of the flesh, be a disease beyond the reach of the human soul, I would again draw your attention to the fact that it yields to the touch of the Divine Physician, as the affliction of Naaman yielded at the Jordan waters. And there are especially two or three incidents about the physical cure of Naaman with which I would drive this truth home and lead you to the Fountain of Life. The first was, that he was induced to travel from Damascus to the home of the Prophet Elisha, through the influence of a little captive Jewish maiden, who was a slave of Naaman's wife. I can imagine the little Jewish slave lying awake upon her humble couch, as, night after night, she hears the great Syrian general tramping up and down in his palace rooms. She hears him groan when he is awake. Then she hears the general and his wife talking of the cause of Naaman's trouble. So one day she timidly pulls at her mistress' skirts and says, "Mistress, why do you not have master seek the prophet of Israel? He would cure him of his leprosy!" Then the horses were hitched to the chariots. Then the journey was taken to the far off prophet's home.

Here, my brother, is the Christian's duty. The humblest child of God can perform it. The service rendered to the great general by this captive child, you can render to the moral lepers around you. I am doing no more than this from this pulpit. I am telling you where there is a cure for this fatal disease. However great you may be, if you have in your nature the germ of sin, I say as did the Hebrew maid—"Would God you would go to Jesus, for he would restore you." I cry to you as did that humble preacher, who, one stormy day, started Charles H. Spurgeon upon his glorious work, when he cried, "Young man afflicted with doubts and troubles, look to Jesus! Look! Look!" Will you bathe in Christ's Blood? Will you bathe now? Will you go to Christ and be spiritually cured? The second fact about the cure of the leper Naaman with which I would impress you, was that Elisha told him to go and bathe in the River Jordan. I would bid you to dip into that River which flows from out of the Throne of the Lamb, because it is a wide river. It is a river so wide and deep that all of us can enter it at once, side by side, and there will yet be enough water to cleanse us all from our sins. I would have you wade to-day into the River of Life, because I want to take your hand in mine, and as your pastor and friend, I want to enter this Saviour's River, so that I also can be cleansed of my own sins by your side, and have my flesh and yours, like Naaman's, become as pure as a little child's. My dear friends, leprosy with sin, will you let me lead you to the River of Eternal Cleansing?

experiences, so that if there had been wandering or declension, the fact might be realized, and the cause identified. The audience, which filled every inch of the vast auditorium, listened intently to the preacher's eloquent words.

At three o'clock another service was held, when a sermon was delivered by Rev. G. A. Johnston Ross, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Cambridge, England. His subject was the many-sided character of our Lord and the wonderful balance of his perfect attributes. This service was followed by another, at which Dr. L. W. Munhall, the famous evangelist, preached. His text was Zech. 4: 6, "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." Dr. Munhall dwelt on the principle that in the life of the individual, at conversion and in his subsequent career, as well as in the life of the church, the only sure round of dependence was the Holy Spirit's work, without which there could be no true conversion, nor any extended revival.

In the evening there was an open-air service, at which an immense audience gathered on the side of a hill. Dr. James Mursell, of London, England, was the preacher, and his subject was Self-sacrifice. The final service of the day was conducted by Rev. George Jackson, D.D., of Edinburgh, Scotland, who preached on the law that assimilates the life to the object of the mind's thought.

The exercises of a day, so full of high spiritual teaching, formed an appropriate beginning to the ten following days during which the Conference was in session. On each day the doctrinal was wisely blended with the practical, the subjects being chosen with a view to refreshing variety. On Monday the Conference took up the subject of the Propagation of the Gospel among the heath, after which there were three services, conducted, respectively, by Drs. Mursell, Ross, and Munhall. At the hillside service, Prof. R. R. Lloyd, of the San

LEADERS AND PROMINENT SPEAKERS AT THE WINONA LAKE CONFERENCE

Francisco Theological Seminary, preached. In the evening there was a Conference on Rescue Mission Work, at which addresses were delivered by Mr. Harry Monroe, of Chicago; S. H. Hadley, of New York; W. M. Bruce, of Louisville, Ky., and other well-known Mission workers.

The subject for the day, on Tuesday, was, "The Work of the Evangelist." Among the speakers were Dr. Chapman, Dr. Wharton, Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, Dr. Munhall, Rev. E. S. Stucker and Rev. Arthur J. Smith. On Wednesday the Conference took up the question of Church Finance, under the leadership of Dr. D. Asa Blackburn, of the Church of the Strangers, in New York. Other kindred subjects of practical church life were considered by Rev. Francis E. Smiley, Dr. R. A. Walton, Dr. George R. Stewart, and other speakers. Besides these there were, as on other days, sermons by Drs. Jackson and Johnston Ross. Thursday and Friday were devoted to various aspects of Sunday School work, at which addresses were given by the following, among other leaders: Mr. W. C. Pearse, Mrs. Lamoreaux of Chicago, Dr. S. A. Ort, of Springfield, O., Dr. John Potts, of Toronto, and Dr. John Balcom Shaw, of New York. Saturday was given up to the subject of Foreign Missions. Dr. H. G. Underwood from Korea, and Miss M. B. Croll, of Kingston, Jamaica, gave the practical view of the missionary life. During the four concluding days of the Conference, many important subjects were discussed. Among them the Preaching of Object Sermons, Evangelistic Methods in the Pastorate, The Principle of the Tithe, Young People's Societies, The Model Educational Work at the Bible Institute of Chicago, etc. On these subjects the leaders were men who have devoted themselves to the special department in hand: Dr. James M. Gray, Mr. John Willis Baer, Mr. A. P. Fitt, Rev. S. D. Conger, Dr. John F. Carson, etc. Many of the meetings were held in a large tent named "The Glad Tidings," others at picturesque parts of the grounds, besides the regular preaching services in the Auditorium. As already announced in these columns, the practical outcome of the Conference is to be a systematic, aggressive movement in the Presbyterian Churches of the whole country, the expenses of which will be defrayed by special subscription. Tentative preliminary work has been begun, with most encouraging results, and there is reason to hope that its extension will lead to a large gathering of souls.

The photographs (by S. B. McQuown, of Winona Lake), of the Assembly and its surroundings, which appear in this article, were procured through the courtesy of President A. P. Fitt, of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago. One of the features of the week was a reunion of former Moody Institute students and teachers, at which in all about sixty were present, and an exceedingly pleasant and helpful time was enjoyed. Dr. Torrey's tour of the globe, and the great Gospel work that has sprung up under his preaching in Australia, have attracted much attention in the Conference, and were referred to in some of the leading addresses.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

I. For answers to the questions which appear below, when accepted, we will allow compensation for the matter used at the rate of One Dollar a hundred words. Answers should so far as possible be limited to one hundred words.

II. Answers must be received at this office three weeks in advance of the date on which they are intended to appear.

III. The editor reserves the right to condense accepted answers when necessary, and compensation will be based on the matter as printed.

IV. Do not write inquiring if your material has been accepted. If it appears on this page, you will know that it has been accepted.

V. We cannot return any MSS. sent to the Editor of the MAIL-BAG—not even if stamps accompany them.

VI. Write only on one side of the sheet, and never send on the same sheet anything intended for any other department of the paper.

VII. Letters addressed to the MAIL-BAG must contain the names and addresses of the writers, not for publication, but in order that answers may be sent by mail when that mode is preferable.

VIII. Address all communications intended for this department, Editor The Mail-Bag, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Readers are invited to forward new questions suitable for discussion in this department.

SPECIAL NOTICE

In future, only one question will be submitted each week, in order that a larger space may be devoted to a full discussion of that question. We publish herewith a list of questions to be answered on the respective dates.

Answers to Question of the Week

Succored One "For Jesus' Sake"

On a June morning years ago, I found an aged woman sitting on my doorstep. She begged to come in and rest a few days till she could go to work again; and as I looked down on that poor, miserable, misshapen, tongue-tied, perverse-dispositioned creature, my heart failed me, for I knew what my family and physician would say. Then I thought of the Great Physician and his power, and of the "inasmuch" and "the least of these," in Matt. 25. She was here eight weeks, and as I was alone with her most of the time, the nights especially were seasons of need and spiritual uplifting. One morning, after I had been over her an hour at midnight, fearing that every breath would be her last, she told me she had seemed to see some one beside me all the while I had been ministering to her. After her departure, there were weeks when my own life was almost despaired of; and as the remembrance and preciousness of the Presence that was revealed to me during all

THE QUESTION OF THE WEEK

What particular, personal benevolence or philanthropy, done in Christ's name, has afforded you most genuine satisfaction and given your soul the greatest spiritual uplift?

Sent Her All to Starving India

I believe the one act of mine that afforded me the most real pleasure and thankfulness was sending some money, all that I had at the time, to the poor starving people of India. The Lord surely did bless me in the giving, and I believe he blessed the widow's mite to the good of some one over there.

Brightening the Lives of Mountaineers

By paying for annual subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and other religious papers, to be sent to very poor homes in the Cumberland Mountains. The knowledge that these people, oh, so poor in every way, await with delight the weekly newspaper visitor; the further knowledge that the monotony, child, and she is praying for me, gives me "genuine satisfaction." One cannot fail to receive a "spiritual uplift," when they have helped some one more needy than themselves, "in Christ's name." Surely, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Gave to the Poor and Reaped a Blessing

Probably the greatest satisfaction received from deeds done in the name of Christ has come to me from giving to poor and needy, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, when it has appealed for funds to help starving and needy people, like at the times of famine in India and at the time of the oppression of the Armenians. It is good comfort to know that one helps to relieve hunger or suffering due to destitution or of any other nature. But, the highest form of pleasure is derived from the knowledge of the fact that such help may lead to the christianization of individuals, and this is no doubt often accomplished by the systematic way in which THE CHRISTIAN

THE OPENING OF THE NEW PEOPLE'S PARK AT CONEY ISLAND, N. Y.

The opening of Seaside Park, it is said, marks the beginning of Coney Island's social and moral regeneration. Only clean, wholesome sports and refined entertainments are tolerated in the city's new pleasure-grounds by the ocean. Work was begun May 14. July 1 the Park was dedicated to the people. The appropriation for improvements was $50,000. The Park Commissioners intend that this shall be a "garden by the sea." Trees, shrubs, grass and flowering plants will adorn in luxuriance after awhile the walks subdividing the twelve-and-a-half acres comprised in the Park boundaries. In some sections flower-beds already make the landscape gay. Such a magnificent stretch of beach in easy and economical reach of our city as is represented by Coney Island is indeed worthy of redemption in every way. It ought to be a safe, happy summer refuge for mothers, babies and young folks, and in no sense a resort for evil-doers. It is estimated that the Brooklyn cars carry 4,000,000 people to Coney Island every summer. It were indeed well if this multitude, while seeking refreshment for their bodies in old ocean's winds and waves, could find sources of mental and moral uplifting also at wonderful Coney Island.

gloom, and melancholy, of their poor existence in the awful solitude of their mountain fastnesses, are greatly relieved and sweetened by such a slight charity of mine, and the further knowledge that, except for my causing these papers to be sent, these dreary homes, would be absolutely without any religious reading matter, indeed without reading matter or pictures of any kind, not only gives me satisfaction but delights my soul.

Won Her Bible Class to Christ

The work done in Christ's Name that has afforded me the greatest joy, has been the winning and leading the different members of my Bible Class to accept Jesus Christ as their personal Saviour. These bright young lives, once won, may prove to exert an eternal influence through life in uplifting and winning others for the Master.

His Sunday School Class a Blessing to Him

Since I accepted a class in the Sunday School and began to take active part in its services, I have been blessed as never before. In striving to lead others to the light, I have been drawn closer to the Master. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." I have found a truer happiness, a fuller joy in this self-sacrifice than when I remained at home to study the Word for myself alone. "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Helped to Reclaim a Drunkard

At the request of a poor drunkard—a stranger—I left my profitable business to stay with him in his room at the hotel to pray and read the Bible for a day and night. I afterward saw him start on his way, from New York State to Vermont, where, he said, he thought from his past experience, he would be more free from temptations to gratify the drink habit. I heard from him many years afterwards, that he was living happily with his wife, from whom he was separated at the time I saw him. He is now an upright Christian man.

Became a Volunteer Organist

The most satisfactory benevolence that I ever had the privilege to do was for my own church. The church was in great financial straits, and they were compelled to cut down expenses. The church organist was too great an expense, so a volunteer organist was called for. I responded, and, although the work was hard and taxing, it gave me constant recompense every Sunday, during the time that I was there. I felt that it was a great privilege to do this for my church.

A Man Who Lives for Others

I have been helped by the knowledge that within one hour's journey from my home, lives a lonely, poverty-stricken, but tender-hearted man, who manages to assist others. He occupies a hall bedroom in one of the poorest sections of Thirty-first street, but says "just a place to lay my head is all I need." Not a day passes but he tramps the streets, visiting the jails and hospitals on his mission of mercy. Soon after seven o'clock on a winter evening, the captain, as he is called, may be found on Broadway near Fifth avenue. At his arrival, there is a stir among the homeless company waiting for him. He forms them into an orderly company, and walks up and down before them. In the ranks are the broken, the aged and the hungry, waiting for this tender-hearted stranger to secure the fifteen cents necessary to procure a lodging for one poor tramp. He stands with them until one o'clock in the morning, telling the passing public their needs, and by so doing has been able to secure lodging for about forty thousand homeless ones in two or three years.

Miscellaneous Questions

Student, Kansas City, Mo. Is it known positively that the four Gospels were written by the men whose names they bear?

It cannot be proved, but the presumption based on the internal evidence is in favor of that theory. Mark is supposed to have derived his knowledge of the events he recorded from Peter. Our knowledge of Peter's character leads us to believe that if he undertook to write a Gospel it would be such an one as the Gospel according to Mark. Such an expression as that in Mark, 14: 72, "When he thought thereon he wept," implies an intimate knowledge of him such as would be written by Peter himself, or by a close associate. The introduction to Luke's Gospel shows that many Gospels were in existence when Luke wrote, and as he knew of them, he may have availed himself of the material they contained. His remark about writing "in order" suggests compilation. The authorship of the fourth Gospel has been hotly disputed, chiefly because it seems impossible that the writer of Revelation, which is in rugged style, could have written the elegant and cultured Greek of the Gospel. The majority of the orthodox critics now, however, are in favor of the belief that John wrote it.

WRITTEN EXPRESSLY FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" BY PROF. GEORGE L. ROBINSON, PH.D., OF MCCORMICK UNIVERSITY, CHICAGO

III.—Four Days at Mt. Sinai

THE Monastery of St. Catharine, situated in the valley on the northern side of the Sinai group, dates from 530 A.D., having been built by Justinian. It is named after St. Catharine, who was tortured and afterward beheaded in Alexandria 307 A.D. It is in the possession and under the protection of the Greek Orthodox Church of Russia.

The monks were very hospitable. After being served by them to coffee and Turkish delight, we were shown through the monastery. We visited the "Church of the Transfiguration," and there found eighteen of the thirty monks who reside in the monastery engaged in worship. As we passed through into the "Chapel of the Burning Bush," one of the attendants, with a censer in his hand, reverently threw incense into our faces, that we might enjoy its sweet perfume. This chapel is perhaps the oldest portion of the monastery. It is built over the supposed site of Moses' vision of the bush, which burned and was not consumed. It is consequently considered the most holy place. Its general appearance is ancient, yet it is the most richly decorated portion of the monastery.

We also visited the famous library. Here, it will be remembered, Tischendorf, about forty years ago, found the celebrated manuscript of the Bible, known as the Codex Sinaiticus, which he rescued from a basket of waste papers. It is now in the library of St. Petersburg. The Prior took great pains to show us some of the still existing treasures of the library. We were especially interested, for example, in examining with our own hands the famous Syriac Palimpsest, discovered in 1892 by Mrs. Lewis, of Cambridge, England. It is an ancient manuscript, dating from about 400 A.D., consisting of 182 leaves, which are badly wrinkled and hard to separate from one another without injury, each leaf being 8 3/8 inches long by 6 1/2 wide. The entire volume was 4 1/2 inches thick. Mrs. Lewis has recently provided a richly decorated casket for its reception and preservation. In the east room of the library there were about 500 volumes, all apparently manuscripts. Across the hall in the library proper, built recently at Mrs. Lewis' personal expense, there were upwards of 2,500 volumes. The entire collection consists of 2,100 in Greek, 628 in Arabic, and 276 in Syriac. I could find none in Hebrew, and the Prior testified that there were none.

As a whole, the monastery was of unique interest. It was of the usual Greek type. The rules are very strict. The monks are prohibited from partaking of meat or wine. On the other hand, they are regularly summoned at stated intervals, through day and night, to attend prayers. As we reflected upon the rigorism of their monastic existence, we could not resist the thought that their mode of life was in striking contrast to the true spirit of the Gospel of Christ; notwithstanding their isolation from the world in this faraway desert home, and their monastic self-renunciation, they are quite apathetic to the religious needs of the poor degraded Arabs about them. They make no attempt whatever to learn their language or communicate to them the truths of Christianity. How much nobler and more heroic it would be on their part should they attempt to teach the Arabs the way of salvation, instead of planting crosses on the surrounding mountain peaks and shutting themselves up to retirement! Nowhere is the Gospel more needed; yet perhaps nowhere would it give greater offence.

One day was given by us to climbing Mt. Sinai, another to encircling its base, while a third (Sabbath) was spent in soul-culture and holy meditation. We frequently asked ourselves when at Sinai, the question: "If God spoke to Moses in this vicinity, why should he not speak to us?" And our question was answered, for God did, when we "turned aside" as Moses did (Exod. 3: 5) and gave him the opportunity. Never before did God seem so nigh to us as there in the desert, isolated and alone. And we left Sinai with the conviction that there is no limit to what God will speak to one if he will but "turn aside."

The day we climbed Mt. Sinai was clear, and we got a most satisfactory panoramic view of the southern portion of the triangular Peninsula. We were three and one-half hours in ascending. There are two peaks to the Sinai group about one mile distant from each other. The highest is Jebel Musa, to the southeast (7,363 ft.), on which, according to tradition, the ten commandments were given and written on two tables of stone. Here, also, Moses is said to have received his other revelations. The monk who acted as our guide even pointed out the cave in which Moses sat while the Lord passed by and showed him his glory. On the very top there is a small stone structure, called "the chapel of Moses," to which the monks resort for worship about thirty times a year; and very close by, a mosque, which is the scene of a feast in honor of Moses, to whom the Arabs annually sacrifice a over the great amphitheatre-like plain of Er-Rahah. Our voices sounded forth so clearly as we read aloud the Book of the Covenant in Exodus 20-23, that it seemed as though they could have been easily heard from the plain two thousand feet below. We descended by a different route.

The day we spent in encircling the base of Sinai was hardly less interesting than the one described. Starting east we passed over the Mount of Conversation, Jebel el-Moneijah, and down into a deep, broad valley where we found Arab tents and had an opportunity of studying Bedouin character. The people are a poverty-stricken race, living the abject life of the humblest Bedouin Arab. They are neither washed nor well fed. Their home-life is primitive and wretched. Their religion is a mixture of crass-ignorance and cruel superstitions. In short, the Arab is a degeneration.

The little oases which are to be found about the base of the mountain were a welcome surprise to us, and deepened our conviction that we were in the vicinity of the true Mount of God. We found numerous gardens, in which there were not only springs of water but cyprus and fruit trees of various sorts. Particularly in Wady el-Leja (the traditional name of the sister of Moses' wife Zipporah), the olive trees were thrifty and numerous. In one orchard alone there are said to be one thousand. Acacias, or shittim trees, are likewise abundant. Of these, it will be remembered the ark was constructed (Exod. 25: 10).

On the whole, our explorations confirmed the current Mohammedan tradition that Jebel Musa is the true Mount Sinai. Its own majestic isolation, its accessible height, the deep depressions in its top, to which the great lawgiver might easily have retired; the great plain of Er-Rahah at its base, where Israel probably encamped; the adjacent valleys of el-Leja, esh-Sheik, and ed-Deir, all comparatively well supplied with water and timber; the wilderness of Sinai (Nakb Howa) just west of Er-Rahah—these and many other considerations, such as its location relative to Israel's other encampments "by the sea" and elsewhere, and the distance from Sinai to Kadesh-Barnea which is spoken of as "eleven days" (Deut. 1: 2), all point to the conclusion that this is the most probable location for Sinai of any in the peninsula.

We acknowledge the difficulty of placing Midian on the west side of the Gulf of Akabah, but probably the Midianites occupied a large tract of country and roamed, as the Arabs do to-day, over a broad sweep of territory. In that case, Sinai would have been on the outskirts of their territory, not in the centre. With this harmonizes the fact that no mention is made of Israel's coming into conflict with the Midianites until they reached the country east of the Jordan. In Scripture, they are usually associated with the east of the Jordan and the region southeast of Palestine (Gen. 25: 6; Num. 22: 4, 25: 15; Judges 6: 3). Indeed, the name "Midian" seems in the Old Testament to have been used synonymously with "Ishmaelites" (Gen. 37: 28). In Judges 8: 24, Midianites are actually reckoned among the Ishmaelites. Philo considers "Midianites" to be an ancient name of the Arabians. Hence, the hypothesis that the Midianites (or Ishmaelites) occupied in Moses' time the peninsula now known as Sinai is, all facts considered, more probable than that Mount Sinai was situated, as Sayce maintains (though he has never visited this portion of the peninsula), on the northeastern shore of the Gulf of Akabah, in the vicinity of Mount Seir.

lamb in the month of May. Some distance below the summit is the "chapel of Elijah," built over the cavern in which the prophet is said to have concealed himself when he fled to Horeb, from the wicked and threatening queen Jezebel (I. Kings 19: 8), where, also, he heard the still small voice.

The other main peak of the Sinai group is called Ras Sufsafeh, or "the peak of the Willow" (6,540 ft.). Upon this the cloud descended and from it the thunderings of God's voice were heard; while near its top, Moses is supposed to have cut his (willow) rod. Between Ras Sufsafeh and Jebel Musa there are many deep, crater-like depressions, some of which contain trees, grass, and copious springs of water; but so far as we could discover, there were no traces of volcanic action and no inscriptions. We had hoped to be able to find some monumental evidence that this mountain had once been dedicated to the moon-god, Sin, from whom it had probably derived its name "Sinai," or to discover possibly on some remote boulder an obscure text of the decalogue which would forever demonstrate that this was the true and unmistakable Mount of the Law; but we were disappointed. The ten commandments given by Moses were not intended for one nation or for one country, but for all peoples and for every land. Had they been engraved upon the rocks of Sinai they might have remained of local value only, like the inscriptions of other ancient nations.

It was a grand view from Ras Sufsafeh, looking down

The Real Remedy

SEVERAL weeks ago, this journal, in commenting on the disturbed industrial conditions in various parts of the country, took occasion to remark, that, as far as the situation in the coal districts of Pennsylvania was concerned, it had already become a national, rather than a State problem, and one which might eventually call for action by the nation. This view, we felt confident, was shared by many of our readers. It is therefore all the more a matter of congratulation that the subject is already engaging the attention of the national government. President Roosevelt's recent utterances at Boston, Newport and elsewhere—utterances in no sense partisan—have had the effect of focussing public attention on trusts, combinations and industrial conditions. He spoke of the existing evils as something for which there was no remedy in sight, but only a step toward a remedy. The State has the right of supervision and control over trusts, and all agencies whose operations can possibly affect industrial conditions, since these are property creatures of the State's creation. When the industrial conditions become so complicated and extensive that State control is inadequate, then the control must come from the nation itself; and if existing national legislation, under the Constitution, is also inadequate, then, the President urges, the next step should be a constitutional amendment of a character to permit such control.

This is simply going back to the people—the sovereign source of power in this Republic—for the authority to regulate and conduct the affairs of the nation in the interest of the people as a whole. At the same time, as the President has wisely observed, moderation and self-restraint are necessary, lest the temptation should prevail to exert this power tyrannically.

There is no infallible panacea for our social evils, this side of heaven. It is probably inevitable that there always will be a "labor question," and an "industrial problem," as long as the world remains unregenerate; but there should be a way of mitigating the most acute troubles that arise from these conditions, and which now eat into the very roots of the nation's well-being and happiness. This result may be attained through the enactment of regulative legislation, and by the adoption of more conciliatory measures by each side in a controversy. But, after all, the effective and enduring solution, which will adjust the scales to such a true equipoise that strikes, trusts, combinations, and the long list of similar outgrowths of the present system, will forever disappear, need hardly be looked for ahead of the millennium.

What society needs now, what the industrial leaders need, what the nation needs, is the enlightening and converting power of the Holy Spirit. Led by that Divine influence, men will cease to plan for vast accumulation of worldly riches, and will seek to use their abilities in channels of beneficence and helpfulness. If the great revival which has lately set Australia in a blaze—sweeping thousands upon thousands of rich and poor alike into the Gospel net—could only be duplicated in our own land, it would do more toward settling our present industrial troubles than all human agencies combined.

Knowing, Yet Not Knowing Christ

THERE are many who admire and revere the Great Teacher, the pure Humanity; who know much about him and seek to follow in his footsteps in some measure, but who stand outside of that innermost circle, wherein he manifests himself as God Incarnate, the Sacrifice and Saviour of the world. We all thankfully admit that a man's relations to Christ may be deeper and more vital, and more blessed than the creed which he professes in words. But are we not bound to say, in view of all of our Lord's reiterated claims, that not to know him in this his very deepest and most essential character is little different from being ignorant of him altogether?

Here is a great thinker or writer—a great poet, perhaps, whose fame has filled the world. His books are in the library of every cultivated man. He lives in a little remote country hamlet, as Tennyson did, as Gabriel Rossetti did, as Keats and Wordsworth did. The cottagers know him as a kind neighbor and sympathetic friend—that is all. They never heard of his books, they never heard of his great thoughts, they know nothing of his world-wide reputation; and they wonder, after his death, that people come from all quarters of the globe, and ask to see the house where he lived, the church in which he worshiped, the paths along which he used to walk. Do you call that knowing the man? Did they ever really know him? You do not know a man if you only know the surface and not the secrets of his being; if you only know the subordinate characteristics of his nature, but not the essential ones.

The very inmost secret of Christ is this, that he is the incarnate God, and the sacrifice for the sins of the world, and no man will ever know him until he knows him as the Eternal Word, and can say, "We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." All the rest is very precious and very beautiful, but without that central truth we have but a fragmentary Christ, and nothing less than the whole Christ is enough for us.

Heavenly Life on Earth Possible for All

THERE is a heaven for the soul here, a heaven of trust in God, a heaven of peace with God running on through this life and emptying itself into the river of life beyond the grave. How hard it is for a man engrossed in material pursuits to enter and dwell in that Kingdom of heaven! How much he will lack if he does not enter it! But no man must of necessity miss it. No life is too busy, or can be too busy, to be good. What makes a man's life is his spirit. Given the right spirit, and no one on earth can be so occupied but that he will have time, or will make time, for the noblest purposes and deeds.

The matter may be thought of in this way: You take a large box and fill it with cannon balls six or eight inches in diameter. You pack the box until not another ball can be put in. No replacing of that lot of balls can give space for one more; the box is full, absolutely full of cannon balls. But when this has been done, you can go to the box and pour pail after pail, pail after pail of water. The box was full, and still there was room for the water, and there it is, flowing in and around, and covering all. It has displaced nothing; there was room for it.

So in our human life, crowded full as it may be with work and care, there is always room, always time for the inflowing and indwelling of a spiritual fullness, which may supplant nothing, but may give environment and tone to everything.

Among the Workers

—THE REV. TILMAN HOBSON, a California evangelist, is spending the summer and fall months in Gospel tent work in Indiana.

—REV. C. W. WENTWORTH, a young evangelist, is conducting an excellent undenominational work on the East side of New York. His method includes open-air meetings, and the distribution of religious literature among the stores, saloons, docks, hospitals and tenements.

—IN A LETTER acknowledging receipt of $180.25, contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, in behalf of the Erzerum earthquake sufferers, Mr. A. M. Lord writes from Erzerum: "The money coming just at this time is truly a Godsend, and many families will pray for a blessing on the givers."

—RABBI MAYER, of San Francisco, who has been making a study of conditions in Jerusalem, reports that of the 45,000 Jews in the ancient city the greater part are wretchedly poor. Their social and economic surroundings are of the worst description. Christian missionaries are making more converts in Jerusalem, Rabbi Mayer reports, than in any other city in the world.

—THE MAHARAJAH of Jeypore, one of the distinguished Indian princes who visited England for the coronation, chartered for himself and party a large steamer, the Olympia, which was fitted up in accordance with orthodox Brahmin ideas. Six kitchens were fitted up, one being for cooking food for the Maharajah's family deity. A high-caste Brahmin had charge of the water tank. All the drinking water was taken from the Ganges. None of the steamer's crew was allowed to set foot on the space allotted to the Prince and his suite. No veal or beef were allowed to be taken on board. In every particular, the rules of the most rigid Hinduism were observed.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Hope for the Backsliders

—CHRIST IS A restorative power for all backsliders. What do I mean? I mean that man who used to pray, but does not pray now. I mean that man who used to frequent the house of God, but who seldom comes to the place of prayer. I mean that man who used to sit at the communion, but who seldom takes the Lord's cup. Sliding back. It is a very expressive word—backslider. Sliding back from your father's example, your mother's love. Sliding back from God, sliding back into darkness, sliding back toward an unblessed grave, sliding back toward a precipice where the first ten million miles downward is only a part of the plunge. In the country you were professors. You have made shipwreck in town. Did the club blast you? Did fashionable life destroy you? Did the kind of wife you married make you worldly? I do not know what it was, but you feel that you have no more religion than if you had dwelt in Central Africa and had never heard of God and the Judgment Day. Oh, murdered hours! Oh, massacred privileges! Oh, dead opportunities! Come back this day, come back and cry in that man's ear's; arouse him from his horrible somnambulism. walking as he does fast asleep within an inch of his overthrow. Oh, this restorative power, you want it. "Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation." Is that your prayer? It is mine. For great sins, great pardon. For deep wounds, omnipotent surgery. For blind eyes, a divine oculist. For deaf ears, a heavenly aurist. For the dead in sin, the upheaval of a great resurrection.

Christ Hushing the Tempest

—YOU HAVE had trouble. Perhaps it was the little child taken away from you—the sweetest child of the household the one who asked the most curious questions, and stood around you with the greatest fondness, and the spade cut down through your bleeding heart. Perhaps it was an only son, and your heart has ever since been like a desolate castle, the owls of the night hooting among the falling rafters and the crumbling stairways. Perhaps it was an aged mother. You always went to her with your troubles. She was in your home to welcome your children into life, and when they died she was there to pity you; that old hand will do you no more kindness; that white lock of hair you put away in the casket, or in the lockbox, does not look as well as it usually did when she brushed it away from her wrinkled brow in the home circle or in the country church. Or your property gone, you said, "I had so much bank stock I had so many government securities, I had so many houses I had so many farms—all gone, all gone." Why, sir, no storm that ever swept the sea has been worse than this has been to you. Yet you have not been completely overthrown. Why? Christ hushed the tempest. When your little one was taken away, Christ said, "I have that little one in my arms. I can care for him as well as you can, better than you can, O bereaved mother!" Hushing the tempest. When your property went away, God said, "There are treasures in heaven, in banks that never break." So you will find Jesus hushing the tempest.

Christ in Every Ship

—IT IS very important to have Christ in the ship; for all those boats would have gone to the bottom of Genesaret if Christ had not been present. Oh, what a lesson for you and for me to learn! We must always have Christ in the ship. Whatever voyage we undertake, into whatever enterprise we start, let us always have Christ in the ship. Many of you in these days of revived commerce are starting out in new financial enterprises. I bid you good cheer. "Do all you can do. Do it on as high a plane as possible. You have no right to be a stoker in the ship if you can be an admiral of the navy. You have no right to be colonel of a regiment if you can command a brigade; you have no right to be engineer of a boat between river-banks, or near the coast, if you can take the ocean steamer from New York to Liverpool. All you can do with utmost tension of body, mind, and soul, you are bound to do; but have Christ in every enterprise, Christ in every voyage, Christ in every ship."

The Last Storm

—THERE IS one storm into which we will all have to run, the moment when we are about to let go of this life, and try to take hold of the next. Yonder I see a Christian soul rocking on the surges of death; all the powers of darkness seem let out against him—the swirling wave, the thunder of the sky, the screaming wind, all seem to unite in that exigency but that soul is not troubled; there is no sighing, there are no tears; plenty of tears in the room at the departure, but he weeps no tears, calm, satisfied, peaceful; all is well. Jesus hushing the tempest. By the flash of the storm you see the harbor just ahead, and you are making for that harbor. A shall be well. Hushing the tempest.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Boer Hero

VERY pathetic is the condition of ex-President Steyn, of the Orange Free State, who is now in Europe, undergoing medical treatment. He refused to follow the example of President Kruger in making his escape from South Africa when the Boer situation was becoming hopeless, but stayed with the army to the last. This, too, in spite of the fact that his health completely broke down. The constant movement, the rigors and hardships of the campaign and the bitter disappointment of defeat, told heavily upon him and he is now in a critical condition. It is satisfactory to learn that when he reached England, he was, to his surprise, treated not as an enemy, but as an honored guest. Sailors carried him ashore at Southampton, and the best medical skill was summoned to his side. It was found that he had no control over his muscles; his arms and legs were entirely powerless and he was unable even to raise his eyelids. Hopes are, however, entertained that recent medical discoveries and the application of electricity may gradually alleviate the worst symptoms, and possibly lead to his recovery. The other Boer leaders have been treated with extreme kindness by the British government and people. Generals Botha, De Wet, and Delarey were invited to visit the King, and were cordially received. King Edward complimented them on their bravery and their skill, and gave them a hearty welcome to England. It is expected that they will have a share in the government of the Transvaal and the Orange Colony, and will be able, during their visit to England, to secure concessions to their fellow-countrymen, which will be highly appreciated. They are counselling them to be loyal to the British government and have spoken highly of its magnanimity. It will be well for them and their country if they take the advice that the ancient prophet gave to his countrymen, who were in worse case, being held prisoners away from their own land.

Build ye houses and dwell in them, and plant gardens and eat the fruit of them, and pray for the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captives, for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace (Jer. 29: 5, 7).

Beset by Sharks

A tug brought into New Orleans recently a man whom the captain had rescued from a situation full of peril. The man had been out sailing in a boat which had foundered off Biloxi. A sudden squall struck it; it had heeled over on its beam ends, and had filled and sunk. It settled on an even keel, and the mast stood out of the water over ten feet. The solitary man on board was an expert swimmer, and he was just setting out to swim to land when he saw a shark approaching him. He changed his purpose and climbed to the top of the mast. Soon a school of sharks numbering more than fifty surrounded him. They evidently saw their prey, for some of them tried to reach him by leaping out of the water. For more than twenty-four hours he remained clinging to the mast, afraid to venture into the water lest he be devoured by the sharks. He was almost exhausted. With what joy he must have seen the approach of the tug that took him off the mast! Without such aid, he must have died, either of starvation and exposure clinging to the mast, or of the bites of the fierce creatures around him, if he fell into the water. Many a good man has been in a situation in which the destruction of his soul seemed similarly inevitable, but, crying to God, he has been delivered.

Thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling (Ps. 116: 8).

Mistaken Kindness

A man at Altoona, Pa., has been charged by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals with ill-treating his horse. The case is a peculiar one, because the owner of the horse is extremely fond of it. About four years ago, when the animal first came into his possession, he harnessed it to a sleigh and took his family for a ride. All went well at first, but he was turning a sharp corner, on the summit of a hill, when a part of the harness broke, allowing the sleigh to slide down against the horse and partly over an embankment. His terror was extreme. He realized that if the horse became excited and made a bolt, as was the natural thing for it to do, he and all his family would be killed. The horse made an effort to get away, and the owner was so grateful to it that there and then he made a vow that the horse should not do another day's work. This was four years ago, and the horse has not been out of the stable since. The owner feeds it and cares for it, but has steadfastly refused to take it out, though the horse needs exercise and is suffering from the lack of it, hence the prosecution. This was one of the cases in which a vow should have been broken rather than kept. It is strange that he did not perceive that his kindness was really injurious to the horse. Few men would have acted as he did, but there are many who covet things for themselves which would prove a curse, rather than a blessing, to them. God sometimes grants them as a punishment.

They did eat, and were well filled; for he gave them their own desire (Ps. 78: 29).

Carried Off by a Kite

A twelve-year-old boy suffered severe injuries during the recent high winds. He lives with his parents at grown men do not always show such prudence when the treasure they prize is dragging them into sin and threatening them with eternal death.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in perdition (I. Timothy 6: 9).

The Conditions of a Gift

A remarkable decision has just been handed down by the Supreme Court of Illinois. A suit was brought against the executors of a recently deceased millionaire by his niece, to gain possession of certain deeds left by her uncle. He had made a will, but had subsequently accumulated property which he decided to give directly. He addressed envelopes to his nephews and nieces, into which he put certificates of stock and other valuable deeds, making, as he considered, a fair distribution. When he was about to fill the envelope addressed to this particular niece, he found that the deeds he wished to give her were too large for the envelope, so he said he would give them to her personally. But he died before he had an opportunity of doing so. The executors turned them into the general estate, so the niece sued for them, bringing as a witness to prove her claim her uncle's secretary, who was present when he tried to put the deeds into the envelope. The Court has rejected the claim, on the ground that the gift was not complete. A gift, it holds, involves property passing out of the hands of the giver and being accepted by the receiver. As the niece had never accepted the deeds she could not be held to have received the gift, and was therefore not entitled to it. It seems a pity that she should not have the gift clearly intended for her, especially as her failure to accept it was not her fault. It may be hoped that she will not miss that infinitely higher gift in the same way, as so many do. The whole world might be saved through the atonement of Christ, but that blessing, too, does not become operative, till it is accepted.

Let us therefore fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it (Heb. 4: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

Both houses of the New South Wales Legislature have passed the bill giving women suffrage.

There are now 6,355 Young Men's Christian Associations in the world, of which 1,575 are in North America and 1,169 in Great Britain.

During the past fifteen years Protestant missions have brought into connection with the Christian Church between 8,000 and 10,000 Koreans. They include men of every class, from the lowest to the highest.

John G. Paton, the famous missionary of New Hebrides, recently narrowly escaped death during a battle between native tribes of cannibals. Dr. Paton went on to the battlefield to minister to the wounded, and though spears were hurled at him, he was unharmed.

The Christian population of India, according to the recent census, is 2,923,349, an increase of 638,669 within a decade. Of these, 1,209,039 are Roman Catholics, 571,327 Syrians (Nestorians, Malabar Christians), 453,612 Anglicans, 220,863 Baptists, 82,994 Methodists, 48,197 Congregationalists, 47,704 Presbyterians, and miscellaneous, 289,613.

The Japanese island of Torishima has suffered a disaster like that of Martinique. The whole island is covered with molten lava and volcanic dust. About 150 persons are believed to have perished.

Emperor Menelik of Abyssinia has become so much alarmed by the increase of drinking in his country, that he has issued an edict forbidding, under severe penalties, the importation of intoxicating liquor of all kinds.

Viscount Kitchener, the famous English general who commanded in the Sudan and in South Africa, is a descendant of a family of French Huguenots who took refuge in England, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

The McAll Mission in Paris has opened a new station, which makes fourteen in all now being maintained in the French capital. Gospel services are regularly held in each, besides those on the boat La Bonne Nouvelle, which plies on the rivers.

The services at Ocean Grove, N. J., on August 17 were attended by more than thirty thousand persons. The vast auditorium was crowded in every part. It has been decided to raise a statue in memory of the late Dr. E. H. Stokes. The sum of $3,000 has already been contributed for the purpose.

Prince Bernadotte, son of King Oscar, of Sweden, presided at the recent World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations at Stockholm. The delegates, numbering two thousand, from thirty-one countries, were invited to the royal palace, and were cordially received by the Crown Prince in the absence of the king.

Dr. Thomas Gallaudet, the famous friend of deaf mutes, died on August 27. He was the founder of St. Ann's Church in New York, for deaf mutes, the first of its kind in the world. Like his father, Dr. Thomas H. Gallaudet, the pioneer of deaf mute instruction, he married one of his pupils. The offspring in both instances could all hear and speak. The late philanthropist was eighty years of age.

EX-PRESIDENT STEYN BEING CARRIED ASHORE AT SOUTHAMPTON, ENG.

Hoboken, N. J. Since the vacation began, he and some companions have devoted their time to the construction of a large kite. It was not an ordinary kite, but a phenomenally large one, that was to astonish all the boys of the neighborhood. At last it was finished, and on Wednesday of last week it was to take its first flight. It failed, through getting entangled with the telegraph wires which crossed the vacant lot on which the experiment was made. To overcome this obstacle, the boy carried it to the roof of the house in which he lived. There he would be above the wires and he would have a fine breeze. The wind was favorable, and the kite soared high into the air. The boy was proud of his achievement, but he soon found that the kite was hard to hold. A strong breeze came up and the cord tugged at his hands. He could not bear to let the kite go and his strength was not enough to pull it down. He held to it with all his might, but the wind rose to a gale and at last the kite dragged him to the edge of the roof. He tried to brace his feet, but it pulled him over. He still clung to the cord, but it was not strong enough to bear his weight. It broke, and he fell to the pavement, breaking both his legs and sustaining concussion of the brain, from which, it is feared, he will not recover. If he had been older he would have let the kite go, rather than have allowed it to drag him off the roof; but even

CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER MOORE

How to Foretell the Weather

EVER since man has been in this world he has been wont to ask at every day's close, "What will the weather be to-morrow?" To foretell the weather is not a modern endeavor. In one form or another, almost all races and generations of men have attempted it. To talk about the weather may be commonplace and trite, but it is natural and almost unavoidable. In several forms of industry a knowledge of the weather of to-morrow is an essential to success. It has been recently estimated that the system of storm signals on the Atlantic coast saves an amount of wrecks and disasters that would amount annually to $3,000,000. The knowledge of the approach of a cold wave in the winter of 1897-98 saved to shippers of perishable merchandise $3,400,000.

In order to provide its citizens with a knowledge of to-morrow's weather, the United States Government expends hundreds of thousands of dollars annually in the maintenance of a national Weather Bureau. It has stations in every State and Territory of the Union, and furnishes every day a forecast of the climate for the next twenty-four hours. Although the practice of weather forecasting is very old it is still crude. It has hardly reached the stage of a positive science. The rules for determining it are seldom the same with any two men. The surest and best method is a study of weather bureau charts. They are much more comprehensive and significant than the short prophecies of "fair" or "cloudy" that appear in many daily papers. The charts are issued every day from the various offices of the Weather Bureau scattered throughout the country. They are mailed to every post-office within a distance of twenty-four hours by rail from a weather office. For men who live a long distance from a weather station it is sometimes impossible to have access to the most recent weather chart, but a study of one, even though several days old, will go a long way towards giving you a knowledge of future weather conditions.

"When it is evening, ye say, It will be fair weather, for the sky is red. And in the morning, It will be foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering."

down stream. When a wind, on its way toward a "Low" area, encounters an obstruction like a mountain range, an atmospheric whirlpool, similar to that in the brook, is formed. Its circular motion, at variance with the wind current, causes a storm, whose intensity is gauged by the speed of the current. If the wind is moving at the rate of seventy or eighty miles an hour, the swirl of a whirlpool may cause a cyclone.

The "High" is responsible for cold weather. They draw the cool atmosphere down from the great altitudes above the clouds. The low altitudes draw in the warm moist weather of the earth, and cause "heat waves." By studying the location of "High" and "Low" areas on a weather chart, and the direction of the resulting winds as marked by arrows, you can form a very clear idea of the weather of to-morrow. You can even form some idea of the possibilities of the formation of atmospheric whirlpools, by an observation of the topography of the country over which the wind current passes. If, for example, the "High" rises in Kansas, and is moving towards a "Low" on the Atlantic coast, there is little danger of a storm or a disturbance of atmospheric conditions until the wind encounters the Allegheny mountains, because the country to the westward of the Great Lakes is a level plain that offers few obstructions for the formation of whirlpools.

The weather reports are really the only positive method of foretelling weather, but there are other simple rules, that from time immemorial have been followed by sailors and sea-faring men, whose life vocation makes them of necessity watchers of the heavens. Although

Bright sunshine is not always a safe basis for prophesying a fair to-morrow. Though there may not be a cloud in the sky, if the air in the afternoon is perfectly still, if not a leaf is rustling, or a blade of grass is moving, you can be pretty sure that there will be rain before morning. The wind in its circuit has become exhausted and has died away. A contrary breeze will probably take its place.

Sometimes on a clear day some of the clouds will become broken and will hurry across the sky in small particles, while others will form long white streaks against the blue like gigantic feathers. This phenomena is known in sailors' parlance as "mackerel and a mare's tail."

Mackerel sky and a mare's tail
Makes high vessels carry low sail.

The clouds are scattered and driven by a conflict of the winds which, as it becomes more intense and gets lower, almost sure to be followed by a wind storm, although rain is not always its logical sequence.

A "Red" sunset is usually a sign of clear weather for the next day, and the reverse is equally true that a sun crimson at daybreak forebodes rain. The sun looks red because its white brilliancy is partially obscured by clouds of translucent vapor.

Another practical weather observer is Captain Spliedt, commander of the steamship Pennsylvania, one of the largest vessels of the Hamburg-American fleet. The following are some of his conclusions:

Red stripes across the sun in the early morning or early evening, indicate bad weather, either storm or rain.

In the latitude of the South Atlantic or the Caribbean, exceptionally bright and clear stars at night forebode a high wind on the morrow.

When the sky darkens in the south the black clouds will bring rain, and the reverse is true that a continuous light wind from the northwest is the precursor of dry weather. A change from southwest to northwest brings fair weather.

But in Captain Spliedt's belief the most infallible symptom of weather trouble is a well defined ring around the moon on a clear night. The moon ring means only one thing, and that is a short, violent the average sailor is not aware of the fact, these rules have a scientific basis. In an elaborated form they constitute part of the curriculum at Annapolis for prospective officers in the American navy.

The rules for foretelling the weather at sea do not hold good with equal certainty on land. Wind currents are sometimes broken by mountains, and their course is diverted by valleys, but a knowledge of the topography of the country in which you live, will enable you to make allowances for these interferences with "weather forces," and so add to your knowledge of the "weather for to-morrow." From a captain who has been thirty years in the United States Navy, I am indebted for the following weather rules and their reasons:

The normal tendency of a wind current is to move in a circle from left to right like the hands of a clock. If you covered a map of the United States with the face of a clock, placing XII. on the Canada border and then imagine the hands pointing in succession to east, south, west and back again to north, you will have an idea of a fair weather wind. To express it technically, when the wind veers from north to east, to south, and then to west, the weather will be clear. No matter how intense may be the force of the wind, it seldom forebodes rain or bad weather if it maintains its swing around the clock face. But if the circular sweep of the wind is interfered with by a cross current, and the wind is forced to "back," as sailors call it, storms, clouds and rain in summer and snow in winter are the result. From this general principle of wind currents, the following practical rules of weather forecasting can be deduced:

If, as you sit on the front piazza on an evening you notice that the wind is blowing steadily from the northwest, you can count on a clear and cool to-morrow.

A southwest wind means fairly good weather.

A wind from the southeast is a cross current and is basis for a prophecy of rain, clouds, and storm.

A northeast wind is very contrary, and is often followed by rain or snow.

NEPHOSCOPE, FOR TELLING DIRECTION AND VELOCITY OF CLOUDS

METEOROGRAPH, REGISTERS TEMPERATURE, HUMIDITY, WIND VELOCITY

Winding across a map of the United States in a weather chart are black lines, called "isotherms," that connect different points where the mercury records the same temperature. The dotted lines, or "isobars," in a similar way record an equality of atmospheric pressure recorded by barometers. Certain areas on a weather chart are marked "High" and others "Low." These refer to a difference in atmospheric pressure in different parts of the country.

In just the same way that water runs down hill, so the atmosphere from a high pressure area naturally tends to gravitate to a low pressure area. The greater the difference in pressure, the greater will be the speed of the atmospheric movement, or, in other words, the greater will be the velocity of the wind. For winds are due to these shifts of the atmospheric areas. "If," says a recent report of the Department of Agriculture, "the barometer reads 29.5 at Chicago, and 30.5 at Bismarck, N. D., the difference of one inch in pressure would cause the air to move from Bismarck toward Chicago so rapidly, that, after allowing for the resistance of the ground, there would remain a wind at the surface of the earth of about fifty miles an hour, and Lake Michigan would experience a severe 'northwester.'" In watching a brook dashing down the side of a hill, you have noticed that when the current strikes a rock, or is forced around a curve, a small whirlpool is formed, that is carried by the current for some distance hurricane within a few hours. "As soon as you see the ring around the moon," said the captain, "you must at once heave anchor, stow ballast and get ready to move."

"Many years ago," Captain Spliedt explained in support of his theory. "I was captain of a small trading schooner that was lying off Mazatlan, on the west coast of Mexico. An American bark called the Henrique Teodora was in the harbor at the same time. Captain Stuckmayer, of the Teodora, dined with me one evening, and afterward we adjourned to the deck. It was a beautiful clear tropical night, but by-and-by I noticed a ring forming around the moon. 'We are liable to have a hurricane before morning,' I said. 'Nonsense, man,' my guest replied. 'Why you couldn't get a breeze out of that sky if you went after it with a fish net.' It was ten o'clock when Captain Stuckmayer said good-night, and went over the side to his yawl boat. At two in the morning a cold chilly wind from the west sprang up, that increased in violence until it seemed as though the whole Pacific Ocean were going to be blown ashore. At four o'clock the Teodora dragged her anchor and drifted ashore until she lodged on a rock where she pounded to pieces. I put off in a lifeboat with four men, and rescued Captain Stuckmayer and his wife from the rigging. Some of the bark's crew escaped by swimming to land, and others were drowned. That shows you what a ring around the moon can do in the weather business."

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Teacher as a Friend

AFTER the summer holiday is over, the school-room doors swing wide again, and the teachers go back to their work. So do the pupils, but of the two, the teachers were the more weary when school closed. Few outsiders comprehend how difficult and onerous a teacher's duties are in these exciting days. Time was that teaching was a comparatively simple avocation; when, without special training, almost any graduate of a good school, or any well-meaning and intelligent young woman could teach. Even if her knowledge were rusty, she could keep one up or so ahead of her class, by reading up a bit ahead of them, and, when examination came, her scholars were apt to do her and themselves a reasonable amount of credit. All is now changed. Teaching is far from the simple affair it used to be. Results may be the same, but processes are very different. Any parent of average intelligence, who attempts to assist a child through the bewildering mazes of the evening home-work, will ascertain that his former acquaintance with grammar and arithmetic counts for nothing in these days. "They can't do it that way," asserts the child; and they don't. Not long ago, a mother engaged a receptress, herself an accomplished high-school teacher, to teach a lad in algebra. "Am I to teach him so that he will understand the principles of algebra, or so that he may be able to enter the school?" was the question put by the lady, before beginning her task. If the teacher is to keep the pace set by the requirements of the hour, she must incessantly toil and study, she must know various occult and subtle things once undreamed of, and she must possess the firm health of a soldier inured to the hardships of a rough campaign.

Blessings on her. The little school-ma'am always enlists our admiration. She it is in this country who takes embryo anarchists and moulds them into patriotic citizens. She is the model on which countless young girls form their manners and their speech, while they imitate also her air and her dress, so far as they can. Her gentle firmness contrives to keep in order boys who scoff at policemen, and learn their morals in the streets. As penetrating heaven, ever uplifting and ennobling, the influence of the school-ma'am is felt in the daily life of American homes.

Parents, if you cannot otherwise assist your children's teacher, you may do so by co-operating with her in her endeavors. You may uphold her authority. You may insist that, so far as they are, the children carry well-prepared lessons to school. The teacher should be the honored friend of the family in every household. Children are quick to adopt the revailing tone, and where the mother and father speak habitually of the teacher with regard, the children show respect and render obedience.

A Good Suggestion

A constant reader, C. G. M., sends us this word from Isseton, South Dakota:

We read from the pens of the gifted much concerning the worth of a teacher to humanity. We have heard them called the standing link between youth and vice. Our soldiers are pensioned, and have homes in many States of our Union. Shall we not remember this to her army, some of whom come to the afternoon of life without a competence for old age. This is not always the result of improvidence. Many teachers work for years on a limited salary, supporting their families themselves.

We were pained recently on hearing a teacher who had had a life experience inquiring concerning the comforts of an Old Ladies' home. Is it not time to give the public an opportunity to discuss this subject concerning so worthy a class of people? Any teacher who has served her country as a teacher for a quarter of a century, and finds herself without a competence for old age, has a just claim on the respectful consideration of her State or Nation.

We believe that the subject of a Teachers' Home for the State or Nation is going to be one of the issues of the day. What a beautiful tribute the children could bring to the teachers of their State or Nation by taking the matter in hand. A small amount from each one of school age would make it possible to have a haven of rest for some of their former teachers. Besides, many wealthy children would be glad to give large sums. In the Review of Reviews some years ago, we were deeply touched on reading the report from New Jersey concerning the passage of their State pension law for teachers. One teacher who had been teaching thirty-eight years hailed with delight the message that he could retire on a pension. No doubt some able teacher took his place who could do more modern work. We hope to hear this subject freely discussed.

In some of the older States teachers who are in office for thirty consecutive years are retired on half pay. [EDITOR.]

"Can't You Do With a Little Less?"

A wife says she is tired of asking for money that she really needs, to clothe herself and children, only to be answered invariably by the question at the head of this paragraph, and to have the amount her husband thinks he can spare, grudgingly doled into her hands. Well, a good many married women have a similar complaint to make, and until husbands and wives learn to have complete confidence in one another about the domestic finances, and to treat one another as business partners, the occasion for complaint will remain. Wives

Second Marriages

WHEN a widower marries again, as he is prone to do, after a decent interval, it is usually felt by his friends, that his desolate loneliness made companionship in the bereft home a necessity. If he has children, it is evident that he needs somebody to aid him in bringing them up. A widower with young children is much more helpless than a widow in the same condition. She can take in sewing or washing, if she is poor, and bring up her boys and girls in some sort of comfort and respectability, though often enough they have a hard row to hoe. He, being poor, cannot fend for himself and his bairns at home, cannot cook or make or mend for them, and as he has not the wherewithal to pay a housekeeper, he must needs marry and get one who will work for board and lodging. People in easy circumstances have not the excuse of poverty, and, it would seem, might remain longer than they do, faithful to the memory of the vanished hand and the sound of the voice that is still. But human nature starves on mere memories, and it is often those whose first marriages were most successful, having brought them a rich harvest of love and joy, who seek refuge from loss and pain in a second union.

To those who knew and loved the one who is gone, there is usually a sharp pang when cards come for the second wedding. There is the thought of the wife in her grave, of the husband who toiled so hard and died so soon. A jealous sense of the injury death did these, who fell so early in the crowded ways of the world, and who so swiftly have been forgotten, is as natural and as inevitable on the part of the observant outsiders, as the reaction from a far deeper grief has been on the part of those who remarry. Life is too stern, too clamorous, too insistent in its demands, to allow any but exceptional souls to plod on alone, if they can form new and congenial ties.

It is not probable that anyone forgets wholly the past, or the comrade who made the past a delight, in beginning anew with some one else. The other scenes are over. Finis is written at the end of the other page. But in the back of the mind, ineffaceable, deeply graven, lingers, unobliterated, the image of the first love. A curtain is dropped over it; that is all. And a devotion as real, an enthusiasm as fresh and keen, may accompany the second love as glorified the first. The hearth is swept, the new fire is laid, the flames shall kindle again, and house and heart grow warm in the cheery glow. Though stepmothers are invariably suspected, and often scorned, with an injustice as old as the race, stepfathers are less harshly criticised, and are generally commended. A man can seldom have the chance to be unkind in little ways, and, to do him justice, he seldom wants to be less than generous in his adoption of a wife's family into his love and care. Many women are wonderfully gentle and self-denying stepmothers, but few get the credit their goodness deserves.

are sometimes unreasonable because they are in the dark. "Helen never can comprehend the requirements of business," said a man who was toiling along on a small capital, and often much bothered to meet his payments. Social Amenities

When two persons in a company, or in a family, know the same story, it is the obvious part of politeness to let him tell it whose property it is. To relate another person's story, is almost as bad as to steal his coat. Another thing, if a person who is narrating an incident, or repeating an anecdote, hesitates for a word, or deviates a trifle from some supposed account of the matter, never interfere to give the supposed missing word, or to set the fancied error right. It is extremely tactless to correct another in conversation, especially when the matter involves no practical blunder. Of course, should your friend assert that the only morning train to — leaves the station at eight, when, in fact, it leaves at half-past seven, you would be justified in stating the mistake, and setting him right. But if he says that his Uncle Elnathan arrived last night at seven, when it wanted a quarter thereto, you would as well be silent.

On little social amenities depend the peace and smoothness of many a family party.

Death the "Commencement" of Life

The Death of Moses

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 21
DEUT. 34: 1-12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- "THE LORD SPAKE UNTO MOSES FACE TO FACE." EXOD. 33: 11

ANY nations have had a "grand old man": England, Gladstone; China, Li Hung Chang; Italy, Garibaldi; but, in Moses, the Israelites had the one truly "Grand Old Man." No man has come so close to the very presence of God as he at the burning bush and on Mount Sinai, and at the door of the Tabernacle. No man has ever dared to enter so completely into the counsels of God, or to make such requests of God as he did. But great and grand as was the spirit of Moses, he had a mortal body, and there came a day when God called upon him to lay it aside, even though its natural force was not abated at one hundred and twenty years of age. "Prepare to meet thy God," had no terror for him. He rejoiced that he was soon to see the Face of which it had before been said to him when he had requested of God that he might see his glory, "Thou canst not see my face, for no man shall see my face and live." He might not look upon that face with mortal eyes, but with his angel eyes he might gaze upon it through all eternity. His last words to his beloved people have been spoken. The several tribes of Israel were to Moses as sons, and he has blessed each tribe as such. And now he goes up the mountain alone to die, with no companion beside him but God. In his cup of joy is there no dash of bitterness, no taste of remorse? None now. His punishment was exclusion from the Promised Land, decreed a year ago, when in his impatience he dishonored God on that day when he was commanded to speak to the rock, and water should flow out to satisfy the thirst of the people; and when, instead of speaking, he struck the rock in anger, and so made the power of God seem less to the people. A cloud then rested upon the spirit of Moses. He wished, oh, so earnestly, that he had controlled his hasty temper. But that is forgiven and the event is past. He is reconciled to bear the consequences as a warning to others against impatience and anger. There is joy in his heart that he is so soon to be present with the Lord.

He ascended to the top of the mountain, and God permits him to view the Promised Land. He sees it from one end to the other, its green valleys, its flowing streams, its blessing of fruits and grains. For this supreme moment his eyes have been kept undimmed. He sees it, and rejoices. There is no pain of remorse, for he sees earth with a God's eye view.

And now his immortal spirit is freed from the earth clods of his body. The secret of where that body rests is with God. God knew too well the tendency of the Israelites to worship images and shrines to trust them with the knowledge of where Moses' body was laid. They probably searched for the body of Moses, as they afterwards searched for the body of Elijah three days, but found him not. For thirty days there was mourning for Moses in the camp of Israel. Some sat in sackcloth and ashes, and others uttered weird cries, accompanied by wild gestures of despair. He whom they had murmured against, had even been upon the point of stoning to death, now that he had died, they saw in his true character and were willing to honor.

Illustration and Application

Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel the words of this song (31: 30).

The Double Immortality of Moses

Our lesson to-day really covers the last three chapters of Deuteronomy, including Moses' "swan song," one of the greatest poems of the ages. We think of Moses as a stern lawgiver, but he was also a sublime poet, and this power is the one that finds immortal use in heaven, where they sing "the song of Moses and the Lamb" (Rev. 15: 3). That heavenly linking of Moses' name with Christ exalts him to the highest place ever given to a purely human character, and is the conclusive proof that he is the greatest of men. His death on Pisgah was not the end of life, but only the end of life's school and the "commencement" of larger living. This is proved by his reappearance on the Mount of Transfiguration, sixteen hundred years old, still interested in his people and in all people, for again he spake of "exodus," this time the exodus of Christ, "his decease," by which he would lead the spiritual Israel of all lands out of the bondage of sin into a heavenward pilgrimage.

Moses is also immortal in influence on earth as the chief human figure in Judaism and Christianity, while in Mohammedanism he is second only to the founder. In the realm of civil law he is still the world's chief justice, on whose God-given code are built those of Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred, the corner-stones of civilization. Dr. Lyman Abbott and others have shown that in the Mosaic commonwealth are to be found the germs of modern free institutions.

"That commonwealth was based on universal suffrage; was organized in three distinct departments—legislative, executive, judicial—distinctly defined and separated from each other; possessed two representative assemblies—a Senate and a House of Representatives; had religious faith organized in a church, but with a priesthood prohibited from owning property, and so made and kept dependent upon the people; was equipped with provisions, adapted to that age, for universal education; possessed free speech and personal rights carefully guarded from future despotism; and was so locally organized in separate tribes as to provide for that which is itself the greatest protection against despotism—namely, local self-government. The changes which were later introduced into their commonwealth were not improvements of its constitution, but debasements of it, impairing the rights and liberties of the people. I believe it would be easy to show, did room here permit, that Alfred the Great derived from his study of the laws of this ancient lawgiver the principles which he incorporated into the Anglo-Saxon Constitution, and which we have borrowed in turn from England, and which make us a free and therefore a prosperous people."

The Greatest Man Had No Tombstone
The Lord buried him (vs: 5, 6). The greatest of men had no tombstone, while some of the worst rascals have stately memorials. Let us not think so much of imperishable mausoleums, like builders of the pyramids and of the Taj Mahal, monuments better known than the persons they seek to keep in memory, but be content our bodies shall lie in unmarked graves if only our souls can go "marching on" in heaven and on earth.

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave.
And no man knows that sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

That was the grandest funeral
That ever passed on earth;

MOSES WENT UP TO THE TOP OF PISGAH AND THE LORD SHOWED HIM THE LAND

But no man heard the trampling,
Or saw the train go forth:
Noiselessly as the daylight
Comes back when night is done,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek
Grows into the great sun.

Noiselessly as the springtime
Her crown of verdure weaves,
And all the trees on all the hills
Open their thousand leaves;
So without sound of music,
Or voice of them that wept,
Silently down from the mountain's crown,
The great procession swept.

Perchance the bald old eagle
On gray Beth-Peor's height,
Out of his lonely eyrie
Looked on the wondrous sight:
Perchance the lion, stalking,
Still shuns that hallowed spot,
For beast and bird have seen and heard
That which man knoweth not.

This was the truest warrior
That ever buckled sword,
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen
On the deathless page, truths half so sage
As he wrote down for men.
And had he not high honor,—
The hillside for a pall,
To lie in state while angels wait,
With stars for tapers tall,
And the dark rock pines like tossing plumes
Over his bier to wave,
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in the grave?

—MRS. C. F. ALEXANDER.

As an illustration of the earthly immortality of Moses in influence—interesting also because many critics are attacking Deuteronomy—let us note that when

Deuteronomy as Christ's Shield and Ours

Jesus was supremely tempted, he three times used a single leaf of this book of Moses as his victorious shield (Deut. 8: 3; 6: 16, 13). His, "It is written," silenced Satan, and should silence the critics, for in that form of quotation Christ assumes that this book of Deuteronomy is the very Word of God. Let us then store our memories with the great words of Moses, as Christ did that we, too, may find them shields in hours of temptation. And let us be immortal in good influence. A boy asked his mother why he could not go on having birthdays after he was dead, like Washington. Moses is this year 3,472 years of age and eternal life stretches before him—eternal influence. We can all live forever on earth, as well as in heaven, in the immortal influence of good words and deeds.

This is the land which I swore unto Abraham. . . . I have caused thee to see it, but thou shalt not go over (v. 4).—Moses had been fully forgiven, no doubt, for that sin into which his besetting sin of quick temper had led him a year before his death, in angrily smiting the rock to which God had bidden him to "speak" only. But the consequences, the effect of his sin upon the people and his own exclusion from the Promised Land, were not cancelled. He doubtless himself had come to see that he could serve his people and the world by thus warning the ages that pardon does not make our sin as if it had never been. Rather every sinful word and deed like an escape hawk we have let go that shall continue its evil work, however much we repent that we sent it out. The Prodigal forgiven cannot recall his squandered estate nor his corrupt example. A quick temper, if not cured in childhood, increases like an appetite for alcoholics, until in manhood its victim is liable to a very intoxication of anger, and may forfeit an estate by one rash act. So with other besetting sins, that become at last what the colored preacher called them "upsetting sins. Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound, that is, because God is merciful God forbid.

There appeared unto them Moses (Matt. 17) Moses did enter the Promised Land at last by way of heaven. So ever ungratified longing shall be fully satisfied in heaven. Moses had prayed to God "Shew me thy glory," a prayer whose answer his human eyes could not have borne. That desire and his longing to tread the soil of the Promised Land were both gratified on the Mount of Transfiguration. Moses looking from the mountain top upon the whole Land of Promise has ever been a symbol of the Christian looking with longings for "the land beyond the river."

All Desires Unfulfilled in Heaven

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dressed in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

Oh, could we make our doubts remove
These gloomy doubts that rise,
And see the Canaan that we love,
With unclouded eyes:—

Could we but climb where Moses stood,
And view the landscape o'er,—
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood
Should fright us from the shore.

Did Moses feel disappointed at not entering the Promised Land? If he did, it had in it no element of resentment. His last address to his people showed that he was entirely submissive to the will of God. So this brave, noble, high-minded man, who had given himself wholly to the deliverance of his people, passed away without earthly reward. He had not even the privilege of witnessing the triumph that he had done so much to achieve. But he was content, for it was the will of God, whom he had served faithfully all his life, and in whom he trusted for reward.

In a European discussion of how far objects can be seen it was found that a mountain in Samatra had been seen 180 miles away; one in Java at 180 miles—the length of Palestine; while the Alps have been seen at 200 miles and the Himalayas at 224.

It is boasted that the sun never sets on the British Empire. In a profounder sense the sun never sets in a Christian life. God, our Sun, is ever shining upon it, and what seems suns at death, is but morning in a new sphere of existence.

The influence of one life upon another is well illustrated in the case of a Scotch soldier boy who went to the Crimean war. When he first came under fire of the Russian guns he felt like running away as fast as his legs could carry him. He said to himself that he was a born coward. His tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, his heart thumped like a sledge-hammer against his ribs, and his knees smote together. He looked over his shoulder, as the first movement toward retreat. Just then he was seized by two stout arms and the words rang in his ears, "Fie, fie, laddie! Think o' y mither." That name awoke his courage, and he went forward into the thick of the fray, as if under his mother's eye. When one is tempted to cowardice or any other sin the memory of the noblest soul he has known—a father, mother, a teacher, a comrade—may save the day. Let come thus into other lives as an influence.

LITTLE LIVES SHADOWED

THERE are few, if any, better places at which to sound the depths of the sorrow, tenderness and hardship which enter into the child-life of the slums than at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
Children's Home,

where the very babbling of little ones, carefree and joyous, declare the reverse side of existence as it is found in the tenements. Our readers, who have so faithfully helped us to bring some measure of comfort and happiness into the troubled histories of thousands of waifs, and who are interested in all that concerns our wee beneficiaries, will not find it a burden to read the following brief sketches:

"I want to save my mamma as much washing as possible. My mamma has so much to do," so spoke a thoughtful little maid to her teacher at Mont-Lawn. She was to go back to the city next day. She had made up her small bundle of garments, and she was playing with moderation and discretion, in the effort to keep her clothes tidy. A visitor asked her, "Do you want some pennies to buy candy?" "If I had any pennies," she said, with tears shining in her eyes, "I'd take them all to my mamma."

Agnes is a cripple. She had hardly any clothes—only a slender store on her back and the tiniest of bundles—when she came to the Home. Some friend of the Home had sent us a dainty white dress, "Give it," she wrote, "to some child who will be very careful of it." Housemother Collins gave it to Agnes. How happy she was! She took the greatest care of it and wore it home. Her papa is dead. This is her letter to the lady who sent her to Mont-Lawn: "Dear Friend: I am a little girl, ten years old, and I am just now having a good time at Mont-Lawn, although I can not run about much. It is lovely here. For some time I have had to wear a brace, but the doctor says I am getting along nicely. Your little friend, Agnes."

Two of the quaintest little fellows sat next each other at table! They had just come up, and they were fearfully and wonderfully dressed. One—he was no bigger than Tom Thumb—had on a man's black waistcoat, pinched-in, gathered-up, and "cut-down" to his proportions. He was too funny-looking for anything! His brother's attire was a composite of garments, borrowed from the old, the young, and the middle-aged. They were both eating as if they had not had enough food for a week. "Where is your home?" asked the writer. Their teacher answered: "They haven't any. They were dispossessed the morning we brought them here."

What a pretty thing Jack is! He is soft and fair, and merry and sweet—the dearest wee laddie—almost a baby. He has a scar on his leg below the knee. His voice—it is like a little chime of bells, so sweet and musical it is—says the strangest, hardest things. "My papa—O, he gets drunk—he does—and he comes home mad; and he hits my mamma—and he kicked me there," pointing to the scar.

Jimmie feels as if he were one of the "oldest inhabitants." This is his second summer. He was in dresses last year. He wore a plaster cast, and his head had to be held up in a brace. He is free from the latter now. He put his hand up to his head with pride to show his progress towards health; then, with a patient smile, pointed to where his blouse gaped and touched the plaster cast on his chest. "Take it off sometime," he said.

A working woman with a child in her arms, and several little girls tugging at her heels, came into the Bible House and asked for the Fresh Air Department. "I go out scrubbing," she said. "We have had hard times. My husband been sick since Easter—no work. I have six little ones. Can these go to the country?" They were all entered at once, and an early date arranged for their outing. Little Rosie went into shy raptures over the doll given her.

There are stories far sadder than these—stories in which the crime of a parent throws a dark stain across the pitiful child-life—stories which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will not print, for these little ones have a future—a future that shall be brighter, please God, than their past has been. The cases given are given as types of those that have been already helped. Hundreds needing to be helped clamor at the Bible House door, their little hands beat on Mont-Lawn's gates. Will you help us open those gates to all who knock? The season shortens. Only $3 gives one child an outing; $6 sends two; $9 three; $12 four; $36 twelve, and so on. Cash should be sent to this office; garments to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y.

A HEBREW'S VISIT TO MONT-LAWN

AMONG those who visited and inspected with interest our beautiful Children's Home at Mont-Lawn during the present season, was Mr. Adolph Benjamin, a well-known Hebrew resident of New York. It happens occasionally that, among the poor children of the great city who are privileged to enjoy an outing at Mont-Lawn, there is some little son or daughter of a poor Jewish family, or, it may be, a Jewish orphan. Mr. Benjamin, being a great lover of children, and the founder and patron of a Jewish industrial and religious school in New York, was naturally interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's work among the poor children at Mont-Lawn. Writing of the impression he received, he says:

"After a two hours' most delightful sail on the Hudson, I reached Nyack. Two omnibuses were waiting to convey the children to Mont-Lawn, while I rode in a buggy. When I reached my destination, the first building that greeted my eyes was the handsome chapel. As the children at that time were assembled within, I entered the chapel, and found a large congregation of youngsters. After the religious exercises, they marched up to the big white dining tent and invaded the long tables. It was plainly visible that the pure, invigorating, balmy air sharpened their appetites considerably, as they did ample justice to the wholesome food placed at their disposal. A little later found them all in their little beds.

"The amiable superintendent, Miss Collins, took me all over the many buildings and showed me the sights. To say that Mont-Lawn is a marvel of beauty, would but vaguely express it. To do full justice, and present a faithful description of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, would require a far more facile pen than my own. Besides, it would make a good-sized book. Suffice it to say that the generous donors who maintain the Home, could find no better means of philanthropy. Here, many lives are being saved, not by the pound of cure, but by the ounce of prevention. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Christians in general, are to be congratulated for doing so much good, not only among their own denomination, but also among Jews and infidels, as it is purely non-sectarian. It is to be hoped, however, that the Jews will emulate their Christian friends, and will establish a similar place of their own.

A. BENJAMIN."

Saved to the Uttermost

WITH uncertain steps a young woman, shabby of raiment but still comely of face—"somebody's daughter"—shuffled along the Bowery, picking her way among those who frequent that thoroughfare at night. To her mind, clouded by months of dissipation, which now lacked the excitement of novelty, life seemed not worth the living. Her faith was but a memory; hope was dead; charity a delusion. A slave of sin, she deemed herself a soul lost, past redemption.

With fever-bright eyes she glanced at a bottle in her hand—a small vial, with a crimson label overtopped with a skull. Then she stumbled on toward that ill-famed saloon where so many unfortunate young women have taken their own lives—impelled to self-destruction by the des-distance, and there rose instead a little gray stone church, and near it a cottage, nestled in a wealth of roses. At the gate, a stern-faced man, with the hand of denunciation outstretched, bade a cringing pale-faced girl begone. Her eyes were still fixed upon this visionary scene, when suddenly she was recalled to her senses. Suddenly the music had ceased. The girl arose with a sigh to take up for a few hours longer the burden of her sins.

But while she still hesitated near the Mission door, she heard a clear, strong voice, which penetrated even into the street, and which was proclaiming in earnest tones, the saving truths of redemption. "Christ died to save sinners," said the speaker. "Christ died to save you; and there is joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth, pair and misery following the loss of honor, friends, and the comfort of Christian faith.

Suddenly, above the rumble of elevated trains, the rasping noises of electric cars, the clanging of bells, the general din of traffic and the babel of the hurrying crowds came the sound of sweet music. Some one was singing:

Take all my sins away,
And let me, from this day,
Be wholly thine.

The girl stopped to listen. Voice and words thrilled her, calling up memories of a dear and tender past. Looking around she saw that she stood in front of the Bowery Mission. The doors stood wide open, and now from within came the solemn, throbbing notes of an organ, and the blended voices of many singers, flooding the air in chorus with the golden promise of the old hymn.

Still listening, she drew closer and closer to the door of the Mission. Finally, through sheer weariness, she sank down on the doorstep, her eyes staring dreamily ahead. The glaring lights of the shop windows seemed to fade mistily into the more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance."

Earnestly and pleadingly the voice seemed to call to her. The tones grew strangely familiar. "I do not call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," the speaker continued. "Remember, all manner of sins shall be forgiven the sons of men, for Christ, who sinned not, died to save you, you, you. Come unto me all ye who are heavy laden—"

The weary face of the girl lightened. She raised her hand quickly above her head, and in the gutter there was the tinkling sound of breaking glass. She had cast the deadly drug from her.

A matronly, white-haired woman stood in the Mission doorway. Observing the girl, she said, "Won't you come in and have some coffee, and listen to the music?"

Trembling, and with frightened eyes, revealing an awakened conscience, the girl dragged herself within the portals of the Mission, and dropped into a seat near the door, her face covered with her two hands, and tears trickling between the fingers. The white-haired matron sat beside her in silent sympathy. Again the organ sounded, and many voices sang—

Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee.

When the hymn ended, the girl was crouching on the floor, with her face buried in the lap of the sweet-faced woman who had invited her to enter. There were many who passed in and out of the door, some with serious faces, and weary, others with smiles masking the unrest of unbelief, and not a few with the wonderful expression of faith lighting their faces. But the Angel-Mother of the Bowery Mission took no notice of others, as she quietly smoothed the hair of the sobbing girl.

The same strong man's voice, which had spoken before, then addressed those who remained in the hall:

"Friends, I have talked with you several nights each week for over three months, but never before have I been moved to tell you my story—to tell what brought me among you. I beg your indulgence while I confess my sin, and implore you all to assist my search. A year ago, as the pastor of a village church, I was happy in my little home and content with my life. A daughter, pretty and bright as a man could wish, did all a young girl could to fill her dead mother's place in my home, and in my parish work. One summer afternoon, that daughter came to me in the little church, and confessed the sin for which I denounced her—I, who should have done all in my power to succor and protect my motherless child, cast her from me, put her out of my life. Oh, I can see her now as she followed me from the church to the cottage, begging forgiveness, asking what she should do; entreating, imploring, bewildered, shamed, and broken!

"At the cottage, where I forbade her entrance, she left me, with face like the dead, so set and white it was. Then my life went on apparently the same, except that I worked harder. A woman came to take care of my house—that house which was no longer a home. My daughter, I said, had gone to visit relatives. For months, I had no word of her, and then—the strong voice trembled, and tears filled the speaker's eyes, "then a letter came to me from a nurse in a New York hospital. My daughter was ill unto death, in the public ward of a charity hospital. In her delirium she had told her story, her name, and her home. The nurse felt it her duty to write to me. I hurried to the hospital, but I did not find my child. She was gone, the nurse informed me, she knew not where."

The speaker was quiet a moment, and then said, in a lower tone: "For he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath showed no mercy."

"Then," he continued, "I gave up my pastorate, and left my flock to search for my one lost lamb. And may God, in his mercy restore my daughter to my arms, that I may ask her forgiveness and his."

There was quiet in the hall, and many a ear gave sincere evidence of sympathy, for the man whose head was now bowed in humble prayer.

But a strange transformation, unobserved by the audience, had taken place. The girl had risen from her crouching position by her new-found friend. Her face was transfigured with that grand light which shines from awakened faith and hope. Swiftly she advanced toward the platform. "Father!" she cried.

"Daughter!"

The man, startled, came toward her, but the girl, with uplifted hand and averted face, checked him. She turned toward those assembled in the hall, and in a clear, brave voice, said:

"I have sinned against heaven, and in my father's sight. I have gone astray, like a lost sheep—but praise be to God, the lost is found! An innocent girl, I was sinned against and then was deserted in the pathway of vice. Forgetting the teachings of my childhood, ignoring the commandments of my God, I sought excitement to dull grief. Deeper and deeper I sank into this city's whirlpool of vice, and then—then took liquor and drugs to stifle my conscience, to silence my struggling soul. To-night I procured enough of a drug to end it all. As I hurried along the street, the sound of singing came to my ears—it was the favorite hymn in my father's little church. I stopped to listen, and then I seemed to see the gray stone church, where I used to sit at the little organ and play those dear familiar strains. I saw the little cottage—my home—and heard again my father's voice in anger. When the hymn came to an end, the vision faded; but as I awoke I heard a dear voice calling to me. His voice, forgiveness and entreaty in every tone, said: 'Christ died to save sinners—all manner of sins shall be forgiven—there is joy—in the presence of the angels—over one sinner who repenteth—'"

The girl, unable to speak further, sank to her knees, her eyes closed, her hands clasped. With a simultaneous movement, the father, and many of those present, bowed their heads, and the girl's voice mingled with the others in prayerfully repeating the words of the Fifty-first Psalm:

Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities.

Create in me a clean heart, O God: and renew a right spirit within me.

Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy Holy Spirit from me.

Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit. Amen.

Such is the story of another happy reunion through the instrumentality of the Bowery Mission. The erring daughter rescued from sin and death; the forgiving father finding the child he mourned as lost. Long after the evening congregation had left the mission hall, the father and daughter were still kneeling in thankful and joyful prayer for that Divine mercy which had truly "saved to the uttermost."

MRS. GILSON WILLETS.

A LITTLE CHILD'S FAITH

A RAILWAY train thundering along, a runaway horse dashing towards a crossing at break-neck speed and dragging behind him a buggy; a little child alone on the seat, neither screaming or crying, simply praying—her tiny hands folded, her sweet, calm eyes uplifted! Surely, that is a picture of faith worth treasuring in all minds and hearts. I knew I would not be killed. I prayed to God," she said afterwards, when clasped in her mother's arms.

She is not much more than a baby, little Mildred Meredith. Her mother and her mother's friend, Mrs. Madison, were driving near Ankeny, a small town about three miles from Des Moines, when their horse took fright and ran for half a mile before they could bring him to a standstill. Mrs. Madison, hearing an approaching train, jumped out and stood at his head, and Mrs. Meredith began to climb out. The whistle blew; the horse broke loose, throwing both ladies to the ground. Off he rushed towards the crossing, near which the road runs almost parallel with the railway track. A brakeman on the train saw the child's peril, and jumping off he rapidly moving car, cleared the right-of-way fence at a bound, met the animal fairly in the middle of the road, caught the bridle and clung to it until he had command of the horse. When the child was with its mother, this hero of the rails, refusing to give his name or to accept the gift of money the grateful mother would have pressed upon him, walked to Ankeny. This life of ours has its shadows and its sordid things; but after all, is it not divine and beautiful when it brings forth by the wayside such flowers of faith, grace and heroism as these?

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT

TAKE not the name of God in vain,
Nor language vulgar and profane;
Guard thou the springs of thought and deed,
If thou from bondage would'st be freed.

Unhallowed thought will ever be,
Prime source of human misery;
Of hasty words portent with ill,
Of deeds evened, strong to kill.

Guiltless that man can never be
Who speaks God's name in blasphemy;
Let all men everywhere revere
The Name to saints and angels dear.

Then will our thoughts, by grace refined,
Be source of words forever kind;
Of deeds that cheer and bless the race,
And show God's glory in the face.

AN OLD WAR.

Pretty Near Time to Stop.

Wouldn't it make your friend mad to tell her she was in reality a drunkard, but many women are drunkards unconsciously from the use of coffee, which wrecks their nervous systems, and they seem unable to reform.

A lady in Philadelphia, Pa., was very badly affected by coffee, causing her to have nervous prostration, and she finally woke up to the fact that she was in reality a coffee drunkard. Her doctor had told her that she must give up coffee, but she seemed unable to do it.

One day she read an advertisement about Postum Food Coffee and thought she would give it a trial. She says: "Coffee had such a strong hold on me, that at first I did not make it all Postum, but added a tablespoonful of coffee. After a while I quit putting coffee in at all, and soon found I felt much better. Continued use stopped my headaches and biliousness, and I soon noticed that my nervousness had evidently left me for good. Now I would not use anything else, and the smell of coffee makes me sick."

"I am using your Grape-Nuts also, and think it a wonderful food. I lately relieved an attack of indigestion by eating nothing but Grape-Nuts and drinking Postum for two weeks, and now I can eat solid food and feel no distress." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

REDEEMED MEN GIVE PRAISE

A Notable Service of Song at the Bowery Mission

THE Rev. Dr. M. E. Gates, former president of Grinnell College, Iowa, and now of California, attended both services last Sunday at the Bowery Mission. He delivered a most impressive address at Mrs. Bird's meeting in the morning. His presence at the evening meeting, however, was quite unexpected. He confessed that his interest in the work had become so deep, that he was anxious to see as much of it as possible. Mrs. Bird's Sunday morning meeting, which is always followed by a luncheon of coffee and sandwiches, was crowded to excess. Dr. Gates expressed great surprise at finding a congregation almost as large at the evening meeting. In speaking to the men, he said that he had heard much about the Bowery Mission and its large meetings, but he had generally associated the crowd with coffee and sandwiches. He was delighted to have his mind thoroughly disabused of the idea.

A special feature of the evening's service was the dedication of four hundred new hymn books to the service of God in the mission. These books are the gift of Mr. Ira D. Sankey, who is the compiler of the collection, The Young People's Songs of Praise. It is doubtless the first time the book has been used in public, as it is barely on the market. The Biglow & Main Co., the publishers, acting on Mr. Sankey's instructions, sent to the mission the first two hundred and fifty received from the binders. It would be difficult to imagine a more appropriate book for the Bowery Mission, or, indeed, for any other evangelistic congregation. It contains several of the very best congregational hymns, written by Mr. Sankey himself, and by such noted composers as Sullivan, Dykes, Stebbins, Main, Burke, Danks, Gabriel, etc. Of great interest, too, to the Bowery Mission, is the fact that the book contains several hymns composed by one of its own converts, Mr. Victor H. Benke, the talented young organist of the mission.

On Sunday evening, Mr. Benke was in charge of the meeting, and in the preliminary Song service taught the congregation six new hymns. Very few crowds could have caught the airs of new hymns so quickly as did that crowd of Bowery men. Solos were also sung from the book by converts of the Mission, and where the chorus was a well-known one, such as "Throw out the life line," the effect of five hundred men's voices singing with enthusiastic lustiness and unanimity was a very wonderful one.

Dr. Gates offered a very beautiful dedicatory prayer, and the Superintendent, Mr. Hallmond, delivered an address on the power of music.

Contributions in furtherance of the work of the Lighthouse League (which is organized for spiritual work under the auspices of the Bowery Mission) are still coming. Each dollar contributor receives a membership card and a supply of League literature, with instructions for the formation of circles in other localities. The following are acknowledged:

THE ANGEL IN WAITING

BY DR. A. C. FERGUSON

WHEN our souls are cast down with burdens and gloom,
Or fear of to-morrow's dark way, [tomb,
Like the sorrowing ones on the way to Christ's
We ask: "Who'll the stone roll away?"

With foreboding and fear, at the gray of some morn,

We go forth to hard duty's dark ways,
As if nothing but fate, and hope's efforts for-lorn,
Can barriers move in such days.

Like those heart-broken ones, 'mid the long, weary night,

In our sorrows o'er severed love ties,
We'd haste to the tomb ere day dawns on our sight,

To behold where our lost treasure lies.

Oh, sorrowing soul! Oh, deep-tried one, take hope!

Fear not what thy future may store,
Jesus leaves not his loved ones in trouble to grope,
But sends angels to greet on before.

He, the victor o'er death, is ahead in the way,
His angels are waiting to cheer;

They encamp round his loved ones; just now hear them say,

"Christ will meet thee, tried souls; do not fear."

AN "EXPANSIVE" GIRL. Not Necessarily an Expensive One.

A little Kansas girl is called an "expansion-st" because her clothes require "letting out" so often. She lives mostly on Grape-Nuts since recovering from a sick spell caused by too much greasy food.

Almost all ailments of children (and grown folks as well) are traceable to the wrong kind of food, and the surest relief is to quit the old sort, the greasy, pasty, undercooked or over-one things, that ruin the stomach and bowels.

Put the children and adults on the perfectly cooked food Grape-Nuts.

It is digested by the weakest stomach. Has the delicate sweet flavor of the Grape Sugar and surely and quickly rebuilds the body, brain and nerves.

There's a reason.

Why spend time and skill in knitting and crocheting something only to find that the yarn does not wear, is rough to the touch and fades? If Fleisher's Yarns are used satisfaction is assured.

Their new Knitting and Crocheting Manual will be sent by the manufacturers, S. B. & B. W. Fleisher, Inc., Philadelphia, Pa., on receipt of 5 tickets taken from their yarns and 2 cents for postage.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones in

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It does not grow moss, and is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. They who have investigated it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred white monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers advised White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $1.00 to $4,000.00, write at once for free designs and information. It puts on under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Over $75,000 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

The Miner's Brighter Side

SINCE the publication of the series of articles from a correspondent in the anthracite coal region, many letters have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writers of which present the "other side" of the dark and gloomy picture. As it is the invariable custom of this journal to fairly present both sides of a question, the most representative presentation of the "brighter side," is given below:

Mr. J. M. Shrope of Delano, Pa., writes: "I would like to call your correspondent's attention to tens of thousands of homes of the miners, owned by themselves, containing organs, pianos, books, and every convenience of life; and paid for with money earned at the mines. I would like to take him to the farming regions lying between the mountains and show him well-kept farms owned by miners, paid for with money earned at the mines. The miserable shanties pictured as being the homes of the miners are either uninhabited or are occupied by persons whom you can not get to live anywhere else. They pay little or no rent for the shanties. If we could only get those people to want to live differently! They are not there because they must, but because they want to. They live cheaply and save the money."

"At Shenandoah, which contains the greatest proportion of foreign miners of any of the larger towns in the 'Anthracite,' last winter a rumor was circulated among the Poles, Hungarians, and Slavonians that there was some crookedness in one of the largest banking institutions of the town. The rumor was false, but the foreign population came, lining the streets for squares, and withdrew their deposits, and almost forced the bank to the wall. The money on deposit in the banks of the mining towns is very largely the savings of the miners."

"The day after the strike opened, both banks at Mahanoy City had such heavy drafts made upon them that, had it not been that the money was again deposited in the afternoon by the brokers, to whom the money was paid for drafts on Europe, the banks might have been in embarrassing condition. Now, these were the savings of the men who live in this 'Inferno,' as your correspondent calls the 'Anthracite.' These people at once left for Europe, where they can live on their savings for the remainder of their lives. The way they live here is the way they want to live. They eat their frugal meal, drink their beer, and save the balance of their earnings until they have enough to take them to their old homes in Europe and live there in affluence. The cashier of one bank and the bookkeeper of another told me that many of those people had from $100 to $2,000 on deposit."

"Then I would like to ask your correspondent what he thinks the nine hundred public school teachers of Schuylkill county, and about the same number in the other counties of the 'Anthracite' are doing? Has he not seen school-houses here as fine as in any other part of our country? Nearly every hamlet has its graded schools, and every borough and township its high school, where Latin, constitution, algebra, geometry, English history, general history, etc., are taught, in addition to the common school branches. Then, nearly every town and borough of the 'Anthracite' has its night schools, where the boys of the mines are taught. The boy your correspondent met at Edwardsville and who said, 'Why, lads in Anthracite doesn't go to no school,' must have been a hard case. Undoubtedly, he was one of the lads whom the authorities could not get to school because he would not do it."

"I have worked among the miners for eight years, have taught their children and know something of their condition. For the last eleven years, as Principal of Schools, President of the Christian Endeavor Union of Schuylkill county, and Superintendent of Normal Training Classes of the Sunday Schools of the county, I have come in contact with the people, and know something of their conditions."

Why Modify Milk

For infant feeding in the uncertain ways of the novice when you can have always with you a supply of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, a perfect cow's milk from herds of native breeds, the perfection of infant food? Use it for tea and coffee.

MELLIN'S FOOD

Many babies take large quantities of food but get little nourishment. It is what is digested, not what is eaten, that nourishes. Mellin's Food with fresh milk is like mother's milk, is all digestible and nourishing. Mellin's Food is really "something to eat."

Health, Strength,

SYMMETRICAL DEVELOPMENT FOR WOMEN.

If you will give me fifteen minutes of your time each day to well-directed scientific exercises which I will prescribe by mail for your individual needs directly and definitely applying to your special Development, Reduction or Relief, I can promise you Pure Blood, Free Circulation, Correct Breathing, Perfect Digestion, and the resulting freedom from Nervousness, Constipation, Torpid Liver, Anemia and Obesity.

By the practice of my system of exercises you become thoroughly alive, vibrant with nerve force, which reacts upon mental force and resists disease. A clear skin, rosy cheeks, fullness of life and enthusiasm, and a delightful personality result.

Women do not aim for an athlete's prodigious strength, but for the development of each muscle of the body to uniform strength and symmetry, giving those curves and lines of beauty which have made the feminine figure the model for all sculptors and painters.

My exercises cultivate that distinguished carriage and bearing and the engaging presence and ease which at once bespeak culture and refinement. They develop mental force, will power, and are endorsed by leading physicians, surgeons, and the most eminent authorities upon physical culture.

Only a woman can intelligently instruct women on these lines. Over 5,000 women in America and England are practising my exercises with results far beyond their most sanguine expectations.

If you enclose ten cents in stamps I will send you a card with the outlines of a perfect figure to place on your dresser, and a booklet showing correct lines of the body in poise and movement. Every mother should keep this outline before growing children.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Without Medicine

External Remedy so successful that the makers send it ON APPROVAL to anybody.

Magic Foot Drafts, the new remedy for rheumatism which has created such a furore throughout Michigan by relieving all kinds of rheumatism, no matter how severe or chronic, are now being sent all over the world on approval without a cent in advance. The sufferer is put upon honor to pay one dollar for the drafts, if satisfied with the relief they give, otherwise no money is asked. This plan is a novel one and would result in enormous loss if the drafts did not afford immediate and permanent relief. The remarkable success of the plan proves not only this, but also is a glowing tribute to the honesty of the American people.

The drafts are worn on the soles of the feet because the circulatory and nervous systems are most susceptible at this point, but they relieve rheumatism in any part of the body.

Write to the Magic Foot Draft Co., 810 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich., for a free trial pair of Drafts and their new booklet, "To One With Rheumatism."

A UNIQUE DEATH

The Last Day of the Life of Moses

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER a day of almost unparalleled exertion, Moses "went up from the plains of Moab unto Mount Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho." He went up to meet the Lord before he met with death, "and the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan, and all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim and Manasseh, and all the land of Judah unto the hinder sea, and the South, and the Plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm-trees, unto Zoar." God must have given him superhuman sight to see that extent of country. So Moses died, in the presence of the Lord! How much more may God have shown Moses after his death! If Abraham rejoiced to see the day of Christ, and "he saw it, and was glad" (John 8: 56), must not Moses also have seen his day, when on the Mount of Transfiguration he and Elijah spoke of his exodus, which he should accomplish at Jerusalem; more familiar with the cross than the disciples whom he had sought to instruct about his coming sufferings!

The last day of Moses' life was a wonderful one. We have seen how he had written "this law," referring to Deut. 29-30, which seems to be an appendix to the previous chapters of this Book of Deuteronomy; and that, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book till they were finished, he commanded the Levites to take this book of the law and put it by the side of the Ark of the Covenant for a witness against them (Deut. 31: 24-26). But God would give them another witness. "Now, therefore," he said to Moses, "write ye this song [the Song of Moses, Rev. 15: 3] for you, and teach thou it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel. . . . And it shall come to pass that when many evils and troubles are come upon them, that this song shall testify before them as a witness, for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed. . . . So Moses wrote this song (Deut. 32: 30-43) the self-same day and taught it the children of Israel" (Deut. 31: 10-22). And after writing it, Moses "spoke in the ears of the assembly of Israel the words of this song, until they were finished." And the Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day, saying, "Get thee up into this mountain." And he went up.

What a day of labor for a man who knew that he had to give up his life before the day was over! We are not distinctly told so, but probably the blessing of Moses on the children of Israel (Deut. 33) was also spoken the same day. In the special words of each tribe it is noteworthy that the chief blessing comes upon those who were especially separated unto God—Levi, "who said of his father and of his mother, I have not seen him: neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew he his own children," and Joseph, who was "separated from his brethren."

But the general blessing upon the people at large is a wonderful testimony to how God stands in relation to his chosen and covenant people, in spite of all their wanderings, and of the unanswerable proof in their history that the natural heart of man cannot be improved. Neither their covenant with God, his visible presence among them, the miracles he wrought for them, nor the prophets he sent them, had any power to change the people; only those among them who personally sought and found Him, to whom he gave a new heart, were proved righteous. But in the millennium, when the third part of Israel has been cleansed and brought through the fire, refined and tried (Zech. 13: 8, 9), all of whom shall be righteous (Isa. 60: 21; Rom. 11: 26), then this prophecy shall be understood. Then they will know God, "who rideth upon the heaven for thy help, and in his excellency on the skies. The eternal God is thy dwelling-place, and underneath are the everlasting arms." Then the enemy will have been thrust out before them, then they will "dwell in safety," their "heavens will drop down dew." Then will be sung: "Happy art thou, O Israel, a people saved by the Lord, the Shield of thy help, and that is the Sword of thy excellency. And thine enemies shall yield feigned obedience (margin), and thou shalt tread upon their high places."

Moses' successor, Joshua, was not another Moses: he was "full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands upon him." But "there hath not arisen a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses." There has been One; the very One of whom Moses prophesied (Deut. 18: 18, 19); but Israel would not receive him, and crucified him. Yet it was he who fulfilled the law which was given by Moses, and it is he whom the children of Israel, when he comes again with all his saints who shall be manifested with him in glory, shall recognize as their Messiah.

AN APOSTOLIC WISH*

The Fulness of God and the Means by Which it May be Secured

WAS the wish that Paul expressed for the Ephesians a wish beyond the possibility of fulfillment? It seems so, from a human standpoint. How can the finite contain the Infinite? How can mortal man be filled with all the fulness of God? The very nature of God transcends human conception. The mind fails to grasp what that Being must be, from whom the whole universe proceeded and who maintains all things in their appointed courses. The wisdom and power and knowledge of such a Being are inconceivable to us. But it is this fulness that Paul prays for as a blessing on these poor Christians of Ephesus, who were but recently living lives of hideous depravity. And he evidently regards the attainment as a possibility and encourages them to seek it. The doxology with which he closes his prayer reveals the ground of his confidence. He loses sight of the limits of humanity and dwells on the power of "Him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." Poor and weak and dull human nature may be, but it is material in the hands of infinite power, and as genius transforms the block of marble into a group of statuary, the beauty of which amazes the ordinary mortal, so the power of God may change human nature; and the divine perfections dwelling in the soul may permeate it and produce from the unpromising material a presentation of the Divine, so that men may see God in human form.

A recent biographer describes a great statesman as he saw him in company with his grandchild, a boy of some ten years of age. The statesman was helping the boy to fly his kite, and the two discussed the problem as equals. The spectator amused himself by contrasting the mental world of the two companions. How much of diplomacy and international law and the principles of government there was in the mind of the old man that the child could not even imagine! Yet we can imagine that child growing up with such love and reverence for his grandfather that every year his mind would receive larger ideas and develop, under the old man's influence, until his grasp on the great problems became strong and vigorous. Of himself, even in his old age, the Apostle said that he knew only in part. But he had lived very close to God, and the part that he knew was far beyond that known by ordinary men. Like the child, his capacity to receive knowledge was the measure of his attainment, for the supply was always near at hand, and in the Apostle's case that supply was infinite. The receptacle was filled as full as it could hold, and as its capacity increased, it received more. So that two processes were going on at the same time—the enlargement of power and the reception of the gift up to full capacity of the power. It never contained all the fulness, but it contained all the fulness that it was capable of containing. In this, Christ surpassed all humanity. In him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead bodily, and it is through him that we receive the same blessing varying in degree according to our power to receive.

The important fact to remember is, that his fulness, this reproduction of the divine attributes, comes from without; it is not developed from within. God gives it through Christ, imparts it as Christ promised that he would. Our part in the process is receptivity, and the intense desire for more of the blessing. If we dwarf our souls by yielding them to worldly influences; if we allow desires for wealth, or worldly power, or fame, to occupy our hearts, our receptive capacity for the fulness of God is diminished, and that side of character is impoverished. The way to attainment consists in the two conditions that the Apostle mentions—faith and love. Those are the avenues by which the graces of the God-like character reach us. Both are necessary, as they were during Christ's life on earth, for the reception of the blessings he was able to impart. "If thou canst do anything," one said to him, when he sought healing at the divine hands; and Christ transferred the question to him by asking him if he could believe, because all things were possible to him that believeth. Love is as necessary as faith, for there is no attitude known to man that so enlarges the soul, or elevates it to the level of the person loved. With these two avenues fully open, and an unlimited supply of grace on which to draw, there is assurance of the soul being filled always, and as these avenues grow larger by exercise, there is constant development from day to day, and the assurance is ever given, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

An Aged Bible Reader

I have been attracted by your reports of Bible lovers and readers. As a minister of the Gospel for fifty-six years, and a reader through its whole history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I would say, "From a child I have known the Scriptures, which are able to make me wise unto salvation." Since the first year of my ministry, I have read it regularly from Genesis to Revelation. I am closing the fifty-sixth reading of it, and see something new and helpful every time I read it, and would now, at the age of seventy-seven, advise that all preachers of the Gospel of all denominations thus read it, making them as familiar with it as they were when at school with the spelling book. It is our text-book, the "Sword of the Spirit—the Word of God," and a familiarity with it will always bless those to whom we minister.

A SONG OF FAITH

WHEN your mind is filled with bitter doubt
And faith from your soul has fled;
When your high resolves are put to rout
And your cherished hopes lie dead;
There may come to your heart a keen desire
For a hand to lead you through
The dangerous ways of life's deep mire,
To a higher and better view.

'Tis then, to a strong and earnest plea
For a glimpse of the hidden height,
An answer will come, and the mists will flee
Forever away from your sight.
Doubt not, if the thing you eagerly sought
Proves only an idol of clay,
And those you once so fondly thought
Were true have led you astray.
Not all of the things which men desire
Are but toys of gilded dross,
For many come forth from the testing fire
With only a brighter gloss:
There yet are souls as true to-day
As there were in the years of old;
There are loyal hearts that will not betray
Their friends for place or gold.

Perhaps the years, as they come and go,
Will bring their measure of pain;
Still into your life some joys must flow
To make you strong again.
Your way may lead through bitter strife
And battles which never cease;
But God on high, who watches each life,
At the last will give you peace.

GREATEST HOUSEHOLD FREE NECESSITY

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Family Washing Machine is Absolutely Indispensable in Every Home.

NO MORE RUBBING, STOOPING, BOILING, OR WEARING OUT OF CLOTHES. SAVES TIME, LABOR AND EXPENSE. ONLY PERFECT WASHER MADE.

without Advance Payment or Deposit of any Kind, Freight Paid, on 30 Days' Trial. May be Returned Free of Expense if not Satisfactory.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. It revolves on bicycle ball-bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required. No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in six minutes. The "1900" Washer will wash collars and cuffs, laces, cambrics and the most delicate materials perfectly clean and positively without tearing or wearing them out in the slightest degree. It will wash blankets, bedspreads, carpets, etc., just as easily and thoroughly. The "1900" Washer not only prevents wear and tear, but it saves soap, materials and a great deal of time and hard work. As shown in the illustrations, which are not at all exaggerated, with the "1900" Washer an ordinary wash may be finished by 9 A.M., while with the old-fashioned washboard it would take several hours longer and the work would be very much harder.

ABSOLUTE PROOF FROM USERS OF THE "1900" WASHER.

$1,000.00 Will Be Paid to Any One Who Can Prove That Any of the Following Letters Are Not Genuine:

VERNA P.O., VIRGINIA, March 4, 1902.
GENTLEMEN: The "1900" Washer is the best, cleanest and easiest washer that I have ever seen. Clothes need no hand-rubbing whatever, as the machine cleans them better than by hand. All that is necessary is to have the water ready and the machine properly used does the rest. It is undoubtedly the best washing machine on the market.
GEORGE M. COUNCIL, Postmaster.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., May 14, 1902.
I have given your washer a fair trial. It is the best washer I ever saw. It has washed my heavy blankets with perfect ease. I washed them last spring and rubbed more than an hour, and yet they had to go through again, but the "1900" Washer cleaned them thoroughly clean. We do our washing so quick and have no tired and worn-out feeling as of old. I wish every lady had a washer.
MRS. J. L. BANNER, 4203 Troost Ave.

GOLDEN GATE, ILL., May 6, 1902.
Please find enclosed remittance for your washer. I cannot praise it too high. I don't see how I have done without it before. No more backache. It is a Godsend to weak women. Please accept my heart-felt thanks to you, for it is the first free trial I ever sent for that was indeed free.
MRS. CARRIE STAFFORD.

BUTLER, N. J., October 22, 1901.
Your washer is the best and easiest ever made. I never saw its equal. One of my sons, who is an engineer, gets his over-clothes very dirty. They have been washed by your "1900" Washer just as clean as when they were new. It washes everything perfectly clean. It runs so easy that my little granddaughter did the first two tubs full. It is a marvel and I would not part with it for $100. In two months it will pay for itself.
Respectfully, MRS. MARTHA WITTY.

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A "CHILDREN'S SERVICE" UNDER CANVAS IN THE RICHMOND DISTRICT, PHILADELPHIA

Closing the Great Tent Campaign of 1902

CHRISTIAN workers in Philadelphia are gratefully enthusiastic over the remarkable success accorded to the open-air and gospel tent services this season. There has been a notable demonstration of the Spirit's workings, both in the numbers who are drawn to listen to the Word, and in their receptiveness to the divine call. The work inaugurated four years ago has been characterized by a wonderful deepening and expansion.

During the first two weeks in August 75,000 persons attended the tent services. The largest attendance was at Starr Garden Park, in the heart of the down-town cosmopolitan district, at Seventh and Lombard streets, where 14,200 gathered at twelve services; 271 conversions have been reported from the twenty separate meetings that have been held at this point. Now it is proposed to build a church for the Italians, in order to make the work permanent.

"We have hit the solution of the down-town church problem," cheerfully declared Rev. J. B. Ely, the general secretary of the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee, which has the work in charge. "There is a general impression that the church can't do any good in these sections. But the people can be reached with the Gospel nevertheless. We have covered twenty points this summer, and in no place has our work been so successful, so rich in results, as in the down-town localities. There we have the largest number of conversions, the best attendance and interest. These districts are not hopeless. The tent work here is more largely blessed than in any other section in this city. This fact is a tremendous rebuke to the church."

The committee last year conducted seven tents. This year its service has expanded to include ten tents in the northern, southern, and western sections of the city; an evening service at Nineteenth and York streets; three stereopticon services, on Race street and Chestnut street piers, and at Starr Garden Park, Seventh and Lombard streets; business men and workingmen's noon-day services at City Hall Plaza, Independence Hall, Baldwin Locomotive Works, and Cramp's Shipyard, and not least important of all, a noon-day rally in Witherpoon Building every Monday, in which the workers week this year special Children's Meetings are conducted every afternoon in three of the tents.

The greatest growth, perhaps, has been seen in the work for the children. "Our tent can no longer contain the children who come," said a leading worker at Richmond tent. "The work is remarkable. Five hundred and fifty children were there last Friday evening. Good order is preserved. Instead of greeting me with some deriding cry, it's now a pleasant inquiry about the Sunday School, or the church, as they call the tent."

On the piers, the meetings are large and wonderfully blessed. The river front is not near a residence district, and many people come from a distance. Firemen from the fire patrol boats in the river have come forward, and are helping as ushers and guards, expressing a desire to lead a better life of faith in God.

A more impressive sight is seldom seen, than the crowds of men in the open air at Independence Hall and City Hall Plaza, at noonday, standing reverently, with uncovered heads, while some one leads in prayer. Another noteworthy scene is at the noonday services in the great industrial establishments, Baldwin's Locomotive Works and Cramp's shipyards, when hundreds of men take a part of their lunch hour to listen to the Gospel in song and sermon. In the city parks, large audiences gather to spend part of their rest and recreation hours in listening to the Word of God. At Lemon Hill Music Pavilion, there were 1,500 present on a recent rainy Sunday morning. The music has been a great aid—the Miners' Glee Club, cornetists, vocal soloists, quartettes, choruses—have all been enlisted. Pictures are utilized to draw and hold the crowds while the preacher gives his imperishable message.

The work has been conducted on practically the same lines as last year. Cards are distributed at the meetings, many themselves meet for comparison, interchange of ideas, experience, and for communion and prayer. In the nineteen meetings, which are held daily, except Saturday, an aggregate attendance every week of 30,000 is the record. Instead of a single Children's Service, each

A NOON-DAY SERVICE FOR BUSINESS MEN AT CITY HALL PLAZA, PHILADELPHIA

A STARTLING telegram was lying upon my desk as I sat down to write this sermon. It was direct information, sent to one of the Chicago newspapers, and it read: "Fifty thousand employees of Pittsburgh's mills and factories, face loss of work through a famine in fuel, as a result of the prolonged miners' strike. Coal and coke stacks are nearly exhausted. It is asserted that some of the largest plants will be forced to close in a few days."

Terrible is the suffering which is being caused in the little towns and villages where the Pennsylvania miners live. A lady who just left the village of Shickshinney, which is situated in the heart of the coal region, told me that there the men and the women and the children were practically starving. Even the dogs, gaunt and haggard, were running through the streets like famished wolves. More serious to the national welfare is it to think that hundreds of thousands, and even millions, of men, women and children, all over the East, are being indirectly affected on account of this miners' strike, in addition to those who directly earn their daily wages in the mines.

But the social disturbances attending the Pennsylvania strike of 1902 are no worse than the Pullman strike of 1894, when the troops had to be ordered out, and the fire bells ceased ringing, lest they should summon together a crowd of starving men and women. Then President Cleveland sent the United States troops to clear the tracks for the mails, and the galling guns were unlimbered and made ready to "shoot to kill." The present disturbance is no worse than the famous Homestead strike of 1892, when the Pinkerton men guarded the works night and day, and when H. C. Frick, the superintendent, was nearly murdered. And the strike of this year, and those of 1894 and 1892, are as mere bagatelles compared to the awful railroad strike of 1878, when every great city—North, East and West—was terrorized, and when human blood was being daily shed.

Anarchy is Labor's Foe

The troubles between capital and labor, on account of the strikes, are no worse here than in foreign lands. John Burns, the labor leader, and a member of the present British Parliament, told me that during the famous London dock strikes of a few years ago, that the men under his leadership were so pressed by hunger that at times they became almost uncontrollable. It was only by the most level-headed leadership that anarchy and riot were averted. One day he saw a large crowd of strikers assembled together. There were murmurings and curses uttered upon every side. He heard an anarchist in a nearby wagon pleading with the strikers to end their hunger by the torch and the murderer's weapon. Then John Burns, the labor leader, cried out in a loud voice: "Stand back, men! Stand back, and let me pass." The men stood back. John Burns passed through the opened lines until he came to the wagon and climbed up. Then he turned and said, "Men, you know I am your friend. You know my wife and children and myself are suffering hardship just as you are. But, men, if you will hold out a little longer in this strike, you will surely win, not, however, in the way my anarchistic friend wants you to hold out. He says for you to use the anarchist's torch and the murderer's dagger. He says to use that means which will surely tie the hangman's noose about your neck and turn the artilleryman's guns upon your homes. Is he willing to do what he wants us to do?" With that, John Burns took a daily newspaper out of his pocket, twisted it up as a torch, struck a match and lighted it. Then he turned to the anarchist and said, "Now, friend, take that torch and burn yonder building if you dare." The man's face became as white as death. "Then," said John Burns, "I lifted my fist and knocked him down as a butcher might fell an ox. With my foot I thrust him out of that wagon, as though he were a mad dog, frothing at the mouth, trying to bite my heel."

Strikes among the bricklayers; strikes among the freight men; strikes among the builders; strikes among the sewing girls; strikes up and down this land in every direction. Strikes in times of financial prosperity. Strikes in times of panic. What are the causes of all these strikes? The object of this sermon is to try to adduce some reasons for the labor agitations, present and past, and to show capital and labor that each has selfishly erred and sinned. My object is also to show that if the employer, as well as the employee, would equally live by the Golden Rule, and love their neighbors as themselves, an era of national, as well as individual prosperity, both financial and spiritual, would result, such as the world has never seen.

Capital has sinned, and helped to cause the present social agitation, because it has ceased to make the laborers' interest its own interest. The present social conditions prevailing between capital and labor could not have existed fifty or one hundred years ago. In olden times, the employer associated with his employees. The small factory towns of England nearly always had the manufacturer's homestead within a stone's throw of the men and women who worked in his factory. The result was, that if a workman had sickness in his family, he could go to his employer and get financial help. If he was in trouble and did not know what to do, he could go to his employer and get advice. If he was an honest, energetic employee, he could always feel that his employer's eye was upon him, and that he would be deservedly rewarded. And if he did wrong, the workman also knew that his employer's eye was upon him, and that he would suffer accordingly. The result was, that the manufacturer's mansion and the mechanic's cottage were with the result that the owners looked upon each other as brothers, and members of a large family, in which the employer was the elder brother, or head of the house. Employer and employee in olden time used to live together in a community in the same confidential relationship that Andrew Jackson held toward the people of his plantation. One night, at evening prayers, the wife of his overseer happened to enter the room. Mrs. Jackson beckoned to her to come and sit by her side. An important national official, visiting there at the time, turned to one of the friends and asked, "Does Mrs. Jackson treat all her employees as courteously as that?" "Yes," answered the friend, "and if Mrs. Jackson had not done as she did, the General would have arisen and given to the woman his own chair."

But though the relations in olden times between the employer and the employee may have been very friendly and fraternal, I do not believe that the heart of the capitalist to-day is naturally any less kind and loving and helpful than that of his predecessor. I believe that most of the trouble between the employer and the employee is directly attributable not, as many suppose, to the capitalist's hardness of heart, but to the infinite misfortune that now the employer rarely, if ever, comes in direct touch with his employee. The heart of the capitalist to-day, in its dealings with the laboring classes, reminds me a great deal of the heart of the good Queen Margherita, the wife of Humbert the King of Italy, living a secluded life in her royal palace. She wanted to help a little peasant girl, who had knitted and sent to her a pair of stockings. Queen Margherita sent back another pair of stockings to the poor child. The one stocking she filled with silver coins, the other with candy. She pinned a note to the gift, asking the little girl to write telling her how she enjoyed it. The little girl wrote a letter something like this: "Dear Queen, your sweet gift caused me many tears and heartaches! My father took away from me the stocking filled with money. My big brother stole my other stocking and ate up all my candy, so I have had nothing."

Remuneration Diverted

By the time the capitalist's money, which he gives for labor, reaches the employee, the money, as well as all the sweets that ought naturally to come as a result of that labor, is scattered right and left. The superintendent who can run the mill or foundry at the lowest cost gets the biggest salary. The big officers of the trusts get their millions. The little men, who do the hard work, receive pittance which are hardly enough to allow them to eke out a bare physical existence. The capitalist ought to see that the money he pays for labor reaches the men who work, and that it is not lost on the way to their pockets.

Men and women of the capitalistic class, these labor agitations and troubles will never be settled until you are willing to share your prosperity with those who are working for you so faithfully to make a living. The labor troubles will never be settled until a man, willing to work, can earn enough money, not only to care for his children while he is alive, but to fit them for becoming self-supporting after he is dead.

Hunger is demoralizing. It is maddening, when it is witnessed driving its fangs into those a man loves. Howsoever honest a man may be, his principles are in danger of failing, if his wife and children, through no fault of his, are starving. I heard of one case, that must be typical of the impulses of many who are controlling them with difficulty. It occurred a few years ago, when the silver mines of the West were closed down. A man walked into the village store and drew a pistol. Then he flung a bag of flour across his shoulder, as he pointed his revolver at the men, saying: "When I could find work, I was always willing to work, and then I paid my bills. But now I cannot find work, and my babies are starving. I am going to get them something to eat. I am going to take this flour home. If any man tries to stop me, I will put a hole through his heart." That may be anarchy, but that will be the anarchy this country will have to face, if the time ever comes when the laboring classes cannot earn enough to buy their daily bread. The world does not owe a lazy, good-for-nothing loafer any lodgings better than the poorhouse, or the county jail, when he is alive; nor any burial place better than a grave in the potter's field when he is dead; but the world does owe every honest, faithful man who is willing to work, the opportunity to work. And, furthermore, capital does owe this to its employees—when the good times come, and capital prospers, then wages should be increased and labor should prosper also.

"Now," answers some capitalist, "You are advocating a lot of high-sounding nonsense. You are practically saying that every capitalist should become a philanthropist. He should turn his business into a co-operative concern, and let his employees share as much as possible in his wealth. That does not go in business. Religion and business, like oil and water, do not mix. Business is not run upon the principle of the 'Golden Rule,' but upon the law of supply and demand. We hire, where we can hire the cheapest, so we can manufacture the cheapest. We sell, where we can sell the dearest. We make all the money we can. Then, if we want to be philanthropists, and not business men, we give away as much as we please."

Mr. Childs' Experiment

My capitalistic friend, your statements are wrong. The Gospel and business do financially mix well. The capitalist who practices the Golden Rule in business, and lets his employee share in his prosperity, will "win out" every time. What was the history of George W. Childs? There never was a man who received happier financial results from practicing the Golden Rule than did he. When Mr. Childs, a young man, took hold of the Philadelphia Ledger, it was a financial failure. All employees of that concern were placed upon the lowest possible wages. The trusted men were deserting at every possible chance, and finding other places. What did George W. Childs do? He gathered his new employees about him, and practically said: "Men, I can not pay you much in the beginning, but I promise you one thing, as I prosper, you shall prosper. Furthermore, when any of you become disabled by advancing years, from work, I will pension you for life, so that you can live in ease and support your children. If you will be true to me, I will be true to you. We shall go up together or go down together. I will consider the Ledger staff a big family. And, as far as possible, I shall find my future head men from those who are now working in the ranks." Did the Golden Rule mean a failure in George W. Childs' life? As soon as the new employees heard the ringing words of their chief, they went to work with a will. The subscription list of the Philadelphia Ledger doubled and trebled and quadrupled. Why? Because, when George W. Childs prospered, the employees knew that they would prosper also. Because of their own prosperity as well of his they worked as they never worked before. Those employees made thousands of dollars for themselves. They made millions upon millions of dollars for Mr. Childs. The magnificent results from practicing the Golden Rule in the Philadelphia Ledger can be duplicated in every other big business corporation in any part of the world.

Responsibility Evaded

But the trouble with most capitalists of the present day is that they refuse to do as Mr. Childs did. They shirk their individual responsibility. As your moneys are collected into a great trust or corporation, and you only hold a few shares, you say you are not responsible for what the whole concern may do. You are like the members of an execution squad, who have been detailed to shoot a spy caught within the military lines. You say no one individual is responsible for the execution, because twenty-five bullets instead of one strike the doomed man's heart. But every capitalist who has his money invested in a corporation where starvation salaries are being paid to its employees, is responsible for the damage that his money helps to do. He is responsible if child labor be engaged in his factory. He responsible if men and women, on account of his indifference, go to their mental and physical and perhaps spiritual doom. He is his brother's keeper, in so far as that he is bound to see that the man whose toil adds to his wealth has fair wages.

But the laboring classes, as well as the capitalists, have sinned and helped to cause the present social upheaval. The employee is not any more a saint than is employer. They both at times seem to be tarred with the same black stick. Yet the average laboring man pretends to think that all the cause for the present social upheaval is to be laid at the rich man's door, and not at his own.

Labor Also in Fault

Do the laboring classes always make their employer's interests their own interests? Oh, no. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of them who show little, if any, sense of moral responsibility. When engaging their services to a man, they do not for one instant stop to consider the money which that employer has invested in his plant. They do not stop to think of the financial risk he is running; of the seven years of financial depression which may come to him, when he may have to run his works at a practical dead loss, as when the seven years of famine came to Joseph, in the land of Egypt. They do not seem to realize that, when they shirk their work, they are stealing their employer's money, for time, in the business world, means money. And some, on the slightest provocation, will leave their employers in the lurch, as quickly as a bird would wing its way to the woods, if the cage door should be inadvertently left open.

My laboring friend, if you cannot reach the high Christian standard of loving your employer as you could love yourself, you are simply heading towards the social economic wilderness. The greatest inspiration for future national prosperity is not to be found in the gold bricks which are stored away in the vaults of our national banks. It is in the mutual trust which the capitalist and laboring classes ought to have in each other. If the average business firm could not trust its customers, or was in such condition that the wholesale business houses could not trust it, that average business house would be wrecked within thirty days. The amount of money which is in circulation to-day is as nothing when compared to the billions upon billions of dollars worth of business done in America every year. It was once told by a keen, shrewd business man that at least ninety-eight per cent. of all business is done upon trust—upon the promise to pay or to do.

Now, if the capitalist cannot trust the laborer; if he feels that at any time a walking delegate might come into his establishment and command his men to cease work on account of some unreasonable demand, what does he do? Why, he naturally and wisely soliloquizes: "I cannot trust the labor market. If I should invest my money in a plant, my men may go out on a strike. Then I will be left high and dry with my property upon my hands, like a horse kept in the stable 'eating his head off.' I will not risk my $150,000. I will buy Government bonds, or real estate first mortgages, and take life easy." What is the result? Why, this rich man builds no factory as he would have done, and masons, carpenters, gas fitters and the plumbers lose the contracts they would have had upon that building. And a great number of men and women, who might have worked there, go without steady employment. Then the commercial travelers, and the merchants who would have been able to sell goods of that factory cannot sell them because the goods are not made, and the people, who might have worked in those factories, have earned no money with which to buy. Such evils are often a direct result of that capitalist refusing to build that one factory because of his distrust of labor. It is a wrong distrust, and arises from blunders and lack of sympathy on both sides. All these evils accrue from the fact, that neither the capitalist nor the laboring man will practice the Golden Rule and love his neighbor as himself.

Crippled Enterprise

As a student of social economics, I have carefully studied the prevailing conditions of Chicago, during the years in which I have lived in the Queen City of the West. During the last five years, scores of manufacturers have left our city and have transplanted their factories into the little towns, far away from the labor centres, because they could not trust the laboring classes. Only the other day, an intelligent citizen told me that if he was worth a hundred thousand dollars, he would not invest the same. He would place that money in "gilt-edged" securities. Then he would spend the most of his life in leisure; not because he disliked work, and hard work; not because he did not want to employ men and help the laboring man, but because after he had built some factory or mill, he would live in continual fear of having his money swept away because of some uncalled-for strike. So, my laboring friend, you have sinned as well as the rich man. It is well, even from a worldly standpoint, to protect your employer's interest, as you would your own.

Thus, the white-winged dove of peace, to-day brings a practical Gospel message to the capitalist and the laborer alike. She brings the same kind of practical help, as the falcon of chivalric times did to his master. This knight, being very thirsty, would have drunk from a poisoned well. Again and again, when his master lifted the cup filled with the deadly water to his lips, the powerful wing of the falcon smote it out of his hand. At last, the soldier examined the brook, and found it filled with the waters of death. So, the white wing of the Gospel dove of peace, would knock the chalice of selfish sin from the white hand of the capitalist, as well as from the horny hand of toil.

The Principle of Stewardship

Rich men, are you ready to have the words of my text translated and brought home to your hearts? Are you ready to cease lifting up the golden chalice of selfish sin? Are you ready to be changed so that your lives may become a blessing, like those of Peter Cooper, and William E. Dodge, and Baron Hirsch, and Montefiore? If you are, then you will look upon your money as a gift from God, for the helping of mankind. One of our Presidents defined public office as a public trust. Your possessions, you should regard as a sacred trust, held not for your own gratification or indulgence, but for the glory of God and the benefit of humanity. If you are ready for the lessons of the text, then you are ready to say: "Here is my money which God has given to me. By this money I can give many men employment, and pay them sufficient wages, whereby they can build comfortable homes. I can surround them with books and instruments of music. I can make it possible for them, with the advantages I shall give them, to develop their boys and girls into good men and good women." Capitalists, are you ready to do that? Workers, are you ready to feel that you can never be true to your employers, and give to them the best service, unless you do all in your power to develop your physical, mental and spiritual lives? Are you ready to say: "I will work and be true to my earthly employer, because I am ready to work and be true to my Heavenly King." If you are both equally ready to surrender your lives to the influence of the Golden Rule, then the words of my text will have accomplished their mission upon earth. Then the dark, wide, yawning, fathomless gulf between the employers and employees shall be bridged over by the straight beam of the Cross. Then this land shall see its greatest era of temporal and spiritual prosperity. Then the millennium shall be ushered in. Then the capitalist and the laborer shall clasp hands as brothers.

CANADIAN METHODISTS IN COUNCIL

THE QUADRENNIAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH OF CANADA

By Rev. J. P. Gerrie

THE Quadrennial Conference of the Methodist Church, which opened at Winnipeg on Thursday, September, 4, to remain in session for two weeks, represents one of the greatest religious events of Canada. According to the census of 1901, Methodism leads the Protestant denominations, having thirty per cent. of their number, or sixteen per cent. of the entire population of the Dominion. The present membership is 291,895, which, with adherents, gives the total of 847,765.

It would be impossible to estimate the influence of the church on the religious life of the land. In the earlier days of Canada, the church did a great and far-reaching work. The pioneer missionaries undertook arduous and extensive circuits, and laymen and local preachers were constantly pressed into service. The pulpits everywhere rang with earnest evangelical messages, and revivals were of frequent occurrence. All forms of evil met in the Methodist preachers relentless and uncompromising opponents. The same spirit is manifest to-day, and with the stronger and broader scholarship, the church should carry on its splendid work to yet greater success.

The Conference now near the close of its session is composed of three hundred members, representing an equal number of ministerial and lay delegates. Among these are some of Methodism's strongest and ablest preachers and best business men. Dr. Carman, the President and General Superintendent, is a master in assemblies. The Secretary, Dr. Ross, has had a successful and honored ministerial career. Drs. Potts, Sutherland and Henderson are natural orators and men of large executive ability. Many other names might be given, especially of the younger men, whose scholarship and consecration will be a great factor in the future prosperity of the church.

Among the subjects considered by the Conference, missionary work, home and foreign, have had a prominent place. A proposition was submitted for three general superintendents instead of one. The growing West in Canada is also demanding large attention, where an increase of 178 per cent. in the membership of the church is reported. Steps were taken to close up church buildings which have been kept open since the union for merely sentimental reasons, or for the convenience of a few. This should mean the liberation of a large sum of money for educational and missionary purposes. Initial steps were also taken to approach the other denominations concerning the overlapping now so prevalent throughout the land. Something along this line is sorely needed, because of the expenditure of energy and means in maintaining the appointments of ministers who travel the same ground.

The reports from the foreign field were more than usually encouraging. The general secretary, Dr. Sutherland, has returned from Japan, whither he had gone to inspect the work and make plans for its better prosecution. This visit enabled the Conference at Winnipeg to consider more intelligently the union of the various societies of the Methodist Church in Japan. Four members of the Japanese Mission Conference were in attendance at Winnipeg. Generally speaking, the work in Japan is showing a very gratifying increase, and this is also true of China, where a much more aggressive movement is contemplated. Work among the Indians is reported not so bright, but a new impetus has been given during the quadrennium to missionary effort among the French of Quebec, and the Chinese of British Columbia.

The question of a new hymnal was also an important feature of the programme. It was brought before the Conference by a memorial from the Montreal Conference, and its mover has been in communication with representatives of other denominations to test the possibility of compiling a hymnal that might come into general use in the evangelical churches throughout Canada.

Besides all these matters, there were other vital questions on the programme. Among them the pastoral limit which has already been extended from three years to five; the admission of women to the church courts and the ministry; and the question of Prohibition and Sunday Observance.

Probably the most earnest discussion of all was on the growth of membership during the quadrennium. Four years ago this was disappointing, and it is more so now. Much thought has already been given to this matter, and Dr. Eby concludes an article in The Christian Guardian with the statement that "Methodism needs no new theology or revelation, but a consciousness of her hidden heritage—a doing of her 'first works' in light of modern conditions."

"INCORRIGIBLES" PLEATING WILLOWS FOR BASKET-MAKING

REV. T. P. S. WILSON, SUPT.

BOYS OF THE HOME BUILDING A NEW BAKE-ROOM

RECLAIMING INCORRIGIBLE BOYS

CAN "incorrigible" boys be made into self-respecting men without the mediation of reformatories or penal institutions? T. P. S. Wilson, City Missionary and Superintendent of the Boys' Industrial Home at Williamsport, Pa., would promptly answer this question in the affirmative. By way of indicating the reason for his faith, he would point to the various departments of the Home over which he presides, and where some thirty boys, formerly considered "hopeless cases," are now being taught useful trades, and encouraged to exercise their moral sense.

Many of them are boys whom he saved from the jail or reformatory, through his intercession with the Lycoming County Court. The number rescued is greater since the passage of the Juvenile Court Law, prohibiting the commitment of a child under fourteen years of age to a jail or police station.

All sorts and conditions of boys are among the thirty inmates, and all have to work to make the Home self-supporting. It receives no State aid, though it has a number of staunch backers in Williamsport, who provide the necessary money when an addition to the buildings is necessary, or some new departure is projected.

Mr. Wilson and his wife occupy rooms in the Home, which is situated on East Third street, one of the main thoroughfares of Williamsport, a few blocks from the business centre of the city. Its exterior is homelike. There is not a fence nor a barred window, nor the faintest suspicion of a reformatory about it. At certain hours the boys are allowed to go out into the town. They observe Saturday afternoon as a half-holiday and have loads of fun. A commodious game-room affords a place for healthful pleasure. There is a reading-room, and just the kind of good, wholesome reading, that a normal boy likes. Most of them are passionately fond of music, and that talent is developed as much as possible.

In a commodious schoolroom the lads are taught the common school branches of education. Throughout the entire building the neatness of everything is apparent. All of the painting was done by the inmates. The dormitories, commodious and well-ventilated, are all that any one could wish as sleeping rooms. The dining-room and kitchen are spotlessly clean. Some act as waiters, others assist in the kitchen, serving in various capacities.

Everything is done to win the confidence of the boys, to make them enjoy their life, and to equip them to become good citizens. They are taught to be self-reliant and useful, polite and respectful. In the workshop they may learn any trade to which they seem adapted. They are taught to knit stockings by machinery, to cane and repair chairs, to make baskets, to repair old garments and make new ones, etc. The presiding genius of the bakery, which now supplies bread to people in all parts of the town, is a youth of about eighteen years. Three years ago he was a castaway. When Mr. Wilson took him he showed an aptitude for baking and was allowed to help the man in charge. He learned rapidly, and became very skilful. For some time past he has been in entire charge of the baking department.

His work is a benefit financially to the Home, and each week a certain sum is placed to his credit in the bank, as his share of the profit. Some of the boys are now employed in other establishments.

In its first year the Home cared for thirty boys, the next, eighteen, and now there are thirty. After leaving the Home, a boy is privileged to return, if unemployed, or if he wants. Boys between 8 and 17 are admitted. A system has been inaugurated at the Home whereby unemployed men may also be given work at all seasons of the year, and especially in winter. Materials are supplied to the applicant, an instruction is free. The finished product Mr. Wilson sells to the trade.

In 1885 Mr. T. P. S. Wilson was a conductor on the Pennsylvania Railroad. Feeling called to do charitable work, he with his wife, opened up a little mission in a twelve by fifteen room on East Jefferson street; when crowded out of there he opened a larger mission in an old boiler factory on East Third street, across the way from the present Boys' Industrial Home. In March, 1887, he built the City Mission Chapel, which was the nucleus of the present fine institution.

BOYS RESTING AFTER DINNER BEFORE RESUMING WORK

A NOTABLE MINISTERIAL REUNION IN CANADA

A FAMILY group of nine ministers of the Gospel—father, sons, and grandsons—celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the patriarch of the circle—makes a gathering hard to duplicate. The illustration, accompanying this article, shows the leading figures in a most remarkable convention at Morton Park, Canada, August 3, when jubilee services marked the turning of Rev. C. H. Hainer's half-century of service in the courts of the Lord. Altogether, twenty-four members of his own household were present to rejoice with him; six sons and two grandsons, like himself, appointed messengers of God, being among the number.

Rev. E. A. Hainer, Mount Pleasant Baptist Church, Newark, N. J.; Rev. Levi W. Hainer, Calvary Baptist Church, Norristown, Pa.; Rev. J. A. Hainer, Pearl Street Baptist Church, Providence, R. I.; Rev. W. H. Hainer, First Christian Church, Irvington, N. J.; are pastors of important charges. Rev. Fred L. Hainer, while taking his course at Queen's College, Kingston, serves as spiritual shepherd to the Christian Church at Castleton, Ont. The grandsons, who have entered the ministry, are A. Merlin Hainer, now in the Christian Biblical Institute, of Stanfordville, N. Y., and L. Morrill Hainer, Bucknell University, Lewisburg,

REV. MR. HAINER, HIS SONS AND GRANDSONS

Pa. The last-named is a son of the patriarch's eldest son, Rev. C. D. Hainer, who died in 1887. In our picture, Rev. E. A., and Rev. W. V. Hainer, are holding respectively their small sons. Albion and Harold sit on either side of the father, and leaning against the patriarch is his youngest son. Behind these stand four sons, who are ministers, and Morrill and Merlin, grandsons, who are preparing for the ministry.

The meeting was in the grove. Beside the family, over a thousand friends of the venerable minister were in attendance. He delivered the anniversary sermon from Romans 1: 16; although nearly seventy, his preaching is still full of force and vigor. At 2.30, a congratulatory reunion was held, at which letters from the various churches of which Mr. Hainer has been pastor, were read; also a greeting from the Ontario Christian Conference. At 6.30, there was a touching service in which all the Hainer ministers participated. Members of the family led the singing. August 3, 1852, Mr. Hainer, then only eighteen, was publicly set apart as a messenger of Jesus. He is now one of the oldest ministers of the Christian Church in Canada, and members of the and other denominations, far and wide sent words of congratulation and good speed to him on his jubilee.

f them are signed. The personal work follows. The signers are visited at their homes. They are encouraged to become regular church members. Cottage prayer meetings are started with this special end in view. No effort is relaxed to make the work permanent, and it has been demonstrated already to the satisfaction of the workers, that what has been accomplished is not of an evanescent but of an abiding character. It has been a great means of upbuilding the churches and strengthening their membership, not in one denomination, but in many. A very large proportion of the new converts have found church homes and are happy and active in their new relationships.

Christian workers believe that investment in tent work pays. This year the total cost will reach the sum of $16,000, all of which is met by subscription. No collections are taken in any of the tents. The work began about the middle of June and will continue through the present month of September. There is no sign of diminution in the interest or attendances. J. A. S.

The Gospel Tent Campaign in St. Louis

THE Gospel Tent Meeting Campaign in St. Louis, is now at high tide. The Presbyterians have three tents, the Methodist Episcopal Church two, the Southern Methodist one, and the Baptist church one. There are also several independent tent meetings held, all of which are along evangelistic lines. The Methodists began in June and the Baptists and Presbyterians began the 1st of July, and all have planned to continue through September, some until "the snow flies."

The evolution of the present campaign is interesting. Early in the year the St. Louis Evangelical Alliance, which includes most of the evangelical churches of the city, appointed a committee to consider the advisability of conducting an interdenominational evangelistic campaign during the summer. This committee went so far as to organize and appoint its sub-committees, but undue denominational zeal worked its disintegration. It was found that some of the denominations had plans formulated for a similar campaign, and it was feared that these would conflict with an interdenominational movement.

The Presbyterians were the last to withdraw from the movement, but seeing no alternative, at once proceeded to join forces and undertake a tent campaign of their own. The Presbyterian families thus joining are, the Northern and Southern, the Cumberland, the United Presbyterian, and the Reformed Presbyterian, including some forty different churches. These organized with the Rev. Dr. W. J. McKittrick, pastor of the First Church, as chairman of the general committee, and the Rev. Charles Stelzle, pastor of Markham Memorial Church, as general secretary. The Rev. Dr. Samuel J. Nichols, LL.D., chairman of the finance committee, engineered the raising of the necessary funds, aggregating about $3,500, and which was secured largely by apportionment to the larger churches.

From the first, three tents have been in successful operation, the largest of which would seat comfortably fifteen hundred persons. One of these, "Glad Tidings," was located permanently at Eighth and Carroll streets, which is the centre of the down-town district on the south side. For the first week, Secretary Stelzle preached in this tent every night, likewise also the third week. "Tent Evangel" was first located in the central part of the city, where, for the first two weeks, the pastors of the Presbyterian churches in that section preached. The third week, Evangelist W. E. Biedewolf preached, and the large tent was filled at every for." About two hundred have united with their various churches, and of the remainder, some have united with churches of other denominations. During four weeks, while one tent was in a residence neighborhood of laboring people, mostly Americanized foreigners, and two other tents situated among Americans, their reports showed an attendance for twenty-four nights of 26,881. An average for each tent of 373, nightly.

A Lesson in Helping Others

BY REV. CLARENCE E. EBERMAN

DURING a brief visit to Tennessee town, Kan., in company with the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, upon whose heart the whole village rests as a burden of love, I was standing on the porch of the Settlement House, waiting for my friend to join me. A report had come to him during our visit there, concerning a lad of perhaps twelve years. The boy had been caught in the dishonest act of borrowing money, ostensibly for his sick grandfather, but in reality for his own use. Here was an opportunity to save a life from the first taint of a criminal career by getting hold of the boy. As we passed out through the corridor, Mr. Sheldon's keen eye espied a little dark figure crouching in the shadows of the corner, and he recognized the form as the culprit of the report. He hastened to the boy's side. I could not see the speakers, but this is the conversation which I heard:

"My boy, don't you know that you have done wrong? Why, that's stealing, and if you continue this, you know where it will lead you." "Yes, sir." "Why did you do it?" No answer. "But you must do something to pay back that money." Still no answer. "You must earn it," continued Mr. Sheldon. "Come over to the church this afternoon and take out the ashes, and in that way you can earn the money you have taken. But, my boy, I want you to do what is right, and I'll help you wherever I can. Come to Sunday School." "I hain't got no pants," was the reply. "Never mind that. I'll see that you get clothing. But don't do wrong. It never pays."

As the two emerged from the corridor, Mr. Sheldon had thrown his arm around the colored boy, and, looking intently into his face, he gave this parting admonition: "Always try to do right. Be honest, and I'll help you." Could there be a finer combination than this: this strong, stalwart disciple of Jesus Christ using moral suasion, and at the same time offering every fibre of his vigorous manhood to help a little colored boy to grow aright!

The President's Danger

CITIZENS of all sections and of all political parties are thankful to divine providence that in the recent accident, President Roosevelt's life was saved. It would have been a national calamity, that would have produced a profound shock, if for a second time in one Presidential term, the Chief Executive had been tragically removed. It would have been especially sad if in making himself acquainted in so genial and democratic a way with the people, he had lost his life. During his tour of New England, his speeches have displayed so intelligent a grasp of the situation and so clear a perception of the needs of the country and of the dangers that menace our national life from organized capital on the one hand and hasty and ill-advised legislation on the other, that the country has come to look hopefully on the result of his future influence and to rejoice that at the head of our Government there is a man of statesmanlike breadth of view. We have therefore reason to be thankful that his career was not cut short by this untoward incident.

Our Best

EVERY distinguished and good man, in writing to his friend, once said he wanted to do his work in such a way that when life was over, people, commenting on his career, would say of him that at least he tried to do "his best." Now it is quite certain that we cannot all succeed in just the same way. We cannot all be presidents, capitalists, scientists, and inventors. Many of us will have to go along doing the ordinary thing, with very little wealth or fame. Nevertheless, in the truest sense we may, even under these circumstances, be successful, for we may carry the hero spirit into the commonplace affairs of life, and even in these things leave our "footprints on the sands of time."

Better is it for us to strive to carry a large and noble spirit of seeking to do "our best" into the smaller spheres of usefulness, than to seek after the great things, moved only by the desire of selfishness and pride.

Now, I take the view that at no other period of the world's history have there been better opportunities given young people for getting such a training as will enable them to do "their best" in life's great battle; and surely there never was a time when there were greater opportunities for those who are willing and prepared to take their places among the world's earnest workers.

There is a work for each of us in this great world of ours; for it is God's world and we are God's children. Our training for our life's work is simply being taught how to master those things which hinder us in the full use of our faculties and powers, keeping us from doing "our best."

The best educated man is the one who knows best how to use all his powers and direct them towards some end. Education is simply learning how to do "our best" and the true kind will go on long after we leave school; for during our whole lives, if we are earnest, we shall be getting clearer and clearer ideas of how to do "our best" in that which God gives us to do.

As our knowledge grows of the great world around us and all the facts that govern and control life both physical and spiritual; as we come to learn more and more of ourselves, our powers and limitations, then will we also be able to understand the better to use the opportunities which come to us; and this will be learning to be successful in a truer and better way than striving after the great things; and our success will be in us and not in the accidents of our environments. Thus we may see that nobody can really do his best who merely lives for himself, but we must rise to the higher purpose of living and working to help others. The man who is at "his best" is not the one who is ever saying to himself, "What must I do to be great, or rich, or comfortable?" but he who is able to blend all his powers and efforts in the great purpose of living to get others to do "their best" in the hard battle of life.

It was said of the Perfect Man, "He saved others, himself he cannot save." Artists are willing to give their time and thought, yea, life itself, to painting holy men and women on canvas, or carving angels out of stone. We are called upon to do a nobler work—that of using our powers in molding the men and women with whom we come in contact to be perfect, "even as our father who is in heaven is perfect." He is the most completely educated man, the discordant elements of whose life have been brought into harmony with this great purpose.

It is not what we can get out of the world that makes success, but what we can do to make it a better place to live in. At last, as one has said, "there is no progress except in beginning again; there is no failure except in ceasing to try."

Bishop of the Diocese of Boise.

Hope in Pennsylvania

IT is gratifying to learn that there is now a reasonable prospect of an early termination of the coal strike. It has already inflicted almost incalculable loss upon the people of the country at large, and not upon Pennsylvania alone. It was this widespread and disastrous influence, embarrassing the people and industries of many States, which elicited from President Roosevelt the now famous declaration that if the State proved inadequate to control the affairs of its trusts, corporations and industries, then the National Government must undertake the task. Following close upon this announcement comes the news that Governor Stone may convene the Pennsylvania Legislature in extra session, for the purpose of considering the enactment of a compulsory arbitration law. He holds that in a strike like the present, the participants "should yield individual rights for the benefit of the general public," which is regarded as paramount.

As to the constitutionality of a law making arbitration compulsory, there will probably be conflicting opinions. Yet it is beyond question that arbitration is the only practical solution of the situation. That it should, however, be a national and not a State enactment, is the opinion held by many conservative students of the industrial question, and this view is steadily gaining ground. A National Board of Arbitration, to be a tribunal of appeal from State Boards of Arbitration, with subsidiary local boards, having limited jurisdiction, would probably form part of the general plan. With these organized and running smoothly, the "compulsory" feature, being objectionable and of doubtful constitutionality, might be eliminated, since all parties would quickly become sensible of the benefit of a system under which equity and justice might prevail, and where a generous appreciation of what is due to each party to a controversy, would effectually prevent the sad spectacles of suffering, and also the idleness, bitter antagonism and heavy losses, that are now inseparable from strikes and lockouts.

There is no question affecting human affairs that is incapable of adjustment, if men would only apply the simple yet infallible formula which Christ gave to his disciples: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." This Golden Rule, applied equally by the coal operators in settling their differences with the miners, and the miners in their dealings with the operators, would instantly simplify the situation, smooth out all discords, bring order out of chaos, and happiness out of gloom and discontent.

The operators claim to be men of Christian principle, and so also do the miners. Let them demonstrate the genuineness of their Christianity by practically applying the Golden Rule to the settlement of the present troubles. If each treats the other as he himself would desire to be treated, the attitude of both sides will be generous and conciliatory, and the strike, with all its bitterness, will soon be a thing of the past.

No Laid-Aside Instruments

WE sometimes speak of men who are broken down in health, or crippled by misfortune, or worn out by age as "laid aside," and they themselves so think of themselves, and sadly wonder why they are still kept here, and not released by the hand of death. But this is an utterly mistaken view. God has not one laid-aside servant in this world. He has no shelf on which to put up his instruments, because he is never done with them. You need not pray, as you sometimes do,

"When thou art done with us in this world, take us to thyself in heaven," for the Lord will be very sure to do that. He may change the character of your service, may turn it into something which we dare despise as no service at all, so conceived is our estimate of the importance of our poor little activities. He may say, "I do not want you to be a hero in the battle; I want you to take life's losses and trials and weaknesses and be a hero in them. I do not want you to go with your comrades in the wild charge up that Lookout Mountain; I want you to lie at the foot of the mountain, maimed, and only follow the battle with your eye, yet with cheerful patience possessing your heart." But none the less, just as honorable and just as honored by him, you shall be his soldier and his servant still. No Christian's commission expires until death. If you are Christ's, you will not die so long as you can be of use in his work, and you will not live one moment after you cease to be of use.

GENERAL NOTES

—THE REV. MR. CURRALL, one of the American missionaries who recently began work in Tangier, Morocco, is prostrated with typhoid fever.

—IN THE INVITATION to Bishop William Benjamin Derrick, to preach the Anniversary Sermon in Canterbury Cathedral, England (the occasion being the 355th anniversary of the "Church of Martyrs"), a very notable and deserved compliment was paid to the African M. E. Church in the United States, and its distinguished representative. The venerable church was filled to its utmost capacity. Bishop Derrick addressed his audience on "Christ and the Church," and held their attention throughout an eloquent and memorable discourse.

—EVERY WEEK SEES an increase in the membership of the Lighthouse League—the new organization, under the auspices of the Bowery Mission. The League is organized for Christian work on simple, practical lines, and must prove a welcome aid and adviser to those who have been eager to become personally identified with such work, but have been prevented, from various causes. Applications for membership should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

—THE MANILA TIMES gives an interesting account of a debate between the well-known Philippine evangelist, Rev. Nicholas Zamora, and Friar Valentin of Calocan, a burly Catholic priest. The evangelist had erected a large bamboo tent, and was holding religious services when the friar angrily interfered. He challenged Zamora to a religious debate the next Sunday. An immense crowd gathered, and as the discussion proceeded, and it became evident that the friar was getting the worst of it, Zamora was repeatedly cheered. This so enraged the friar that, losing all control of himself, he sprang at Zamora and struck him several heavy blows on the head. He then fled amid the cries of the crowd, and hid himself in his room, which was guarded to prevent the people mobbing him. The people cheered Zamora enthusiastically.

—THE QUESTION as to Washington's church membership has often been discussed. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, a biographer of Washington, declares positively that "he believed in the efficacy of prayer, prayed regularly, and frequently retired for that purpose" in times of stress and peril. Other authorities state positively that Washington asked permission to partake and did partake of the Sacrament with the pastor and members of the First Presbyterian Church of Morristown, N. J. Major Popham wrote that he had knelt with Washington at communion, and in a letter to Sparks, the historian, Nellie Custis, Mrs. Washington's granddaughter, declared that she had heard her mother say that "the General always received the Sacrament with her grandmother," in pre-Revolutionary times. These authentic statements apparently settle the question affirmatively beyond dispute.

—IT IS SCARCELY CREDIBLE that there should be anything in the statement, published in a Fort Worth, Tex., paper (and forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by a reader in that city), that a certain blasphemous element there purposed to publicly mimic the Crucifixion. It seems beyond belief that the authorities, or the respectable people of any American city, would permit the celebration of an orgy which can only be compared to the frightful scenes that became familiar in St. Pierre in the last days of its existence, when a pig was crucified in mockery of the Calvary tragedy, and another was led through the streets afterward to typify the resurrection. It is awfully significant, too, that on the last morning of the day when St. Pierre was wiped out of existence, the local papers announced as a culminating blow at the religion of the Christians, that "the sacrament would be administered to a horse." That infamy never took place. Let scoffers and blasphemers in other lands remember the lesson.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Li Hung Chang Buried

AFTER an interval of six months, the remains of Li Hung Chang, the greatest of Chinese statesmen, have been borne to their last resting place. Since his death, the body has, according to Chinese custom, been lying in state; but the six months being completed, the funeral has taken place. Early in the morning on the day of the obsequies, high officials performed the act of adoration of the departed spirit. Paper models of sedan chairs, carriages, horses, and servants were then burned, implying that the dead statesman's comforts were supplied. The funeral procession was formed, and the first stage of the journey was performed by carrying the body to Tung-Chow, ten miles from Peking. Thence it went on a junk to Taku, where a special steamer was waiting to convey it to Anhui, where he was born. The first stage of the journey was the chief spectacle. The procession was more than a mile in length, and it passed through crowds which lined the road on both sides. At the head were men bearing boards, on which the titles of the dead statesman were inscribed. Next came his household servants clad in white, which is Chinese mourning, bearing chairs. Two riderless horses followed and then came soldiers and the mandarins, whose office entitled them to take part in the obsequies. These were followed by Buddhist and Taoist priests playing flutes. Then came servants bearing tables, on which were set out the funeral baked meats. Behind these was Li Hung Chang's eldest son clad in sack-cloth. Finally the catafalque, borne by sixty bearers and followed by troops of friends. Thus with all the peculiar pomp of Chinese funeral custom was the great statesman carried to the vessel assigned to bear him to his ancestral burying-place. It seems anomalous that such superstitious observances as the burning of paper models, should have accompanied the burial of a statesman so progressive and sagacious. There would be a better hope of the regeneration of China if the people realized that the blessedness of the dead consists, not in such things as the models represented, but in a soul attuned to the heavenly life.

Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city (Rev. 22: 14).

Accepted Responsibility

A claim for injuries received in a paper mill near New York, at which he was at work, has been brought by a carpenter against the proprietors of the mill. He was doing some repairs at the foot of a shaft, while bundles of paper were being hoisted to the fifth story. One of the bundles slipped out of the chain sling and fell on the carpenter, injuring him severely. There was no dispute as to the nature or cause of his injuries, but the owners of the mill resisted payment of compensation, on the ground that the claimant was fully aware of the danger, and had been warned. It was shown that the man himself, in talking with the janitor of the building, spoke of the dangerous character of the place where he was working, but continued to stay there. "There can be no doubt," says Justice Bartlett, "from the repeated statements of the plaintiff to different persons to the effect that the place was dangerous, that he deemed it an unsafe place in which to work under the existing circumstances as he observed them, and that he elected to work and to continue to work there notwithstanding these obvious conditions." The court therefore dismissed his claim. The judge proceeded on the principle that if a man had been warned, and understood the warning, and yet paid no heed, he must take the consequences. This seems reasonable, but in matters of the soul, people often act as if they thought the principle did not apply.

He heard the sound of the trumpet and took not warning; his blood shall be upon him: whereas if he had taken warning he should have delivered his soul (Ezek. 33: 5).

The President's Accident

News that President Roosevelt had been in imminent danger of death caused a profound sensation through the country on September 3. He had nearly completed his two weeks' tour of the New England States and had addressed a large audience at Pittsfield, Mass., early in the morning. He then entered an open carriage with Governor Crane and Secretary Cortelyou, to drive to Lenox. The carriage had proceeded about a mile and a half, when the driver turned his horses to colored and swollen. Mr. Cortelyou also was cut and bruised, but Governor Crane escaped with a severe shaking. A thorough investigation will doubtless be made to fix the responsibility for the accident. Though all men are equal before the law, it does seem that if there was carelessness which put the President's life in danger, it should be severely punished. The country ought not to be lightly deprived of the services of a man who is in a position to maintain and advance its welfare.

For the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof; but by a man of understanding and knowledge the State thereof shall be prolonged (Prov. 28: 2).

Mont Pelee Again in Action

Two more volcanic eruptions are reported from Martinique, accompanied by heavy loss of life. The people who had returned to Morne Rouge, in the district previously devastated, were horrified, on August 30, to see the volcano again emit smoke and flame. An immense cloud of dust was thrown up, which fell on Morne Rouge and on the ruined town of St. Pierre. At the same time a tidal wave rose at Fort de France, which destroyed the houses along the shore and killed about two hundred persons. Assistance was sent as speedily as possible to Morne Rouge, but as the ashes continued falling, it was not until late the following day that the full extent of the disaster was ascertained. It was then found that ten hundred and sixty persons had perished, and one hundred and fifty others had been severely injured. On September 3 there was another eruption, extending over a much larger area. Vessels arriving from the island report that the loss of life was fully two thousand. The volcano Soufriere, on the island of St.

Vincent, broke out simultaneously into fierce activity, sending up great showers of ashes and stones, which fell on passing vessels, some of which were twenty miles out at sea. The Government has now given orders that the whole northern part of Martinique shall be evacuated. It is strange that such orders should be needed. One would have thought that concern for their own safety would have caused the people to leave; but it appears that they act in temporal matters as so many act in spiritual matters.

If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain looking for of judgment and fiery indignation (Heb. 10: 27).

Prof. Virchow Dead

Germany lost one of her most famous and useful citizens on Sept. 5, when Prof. Rudolf Virchow breathed his last. He was eighty years of age, but was still in full mental vigor. He was a native of Pomerania, but studied medicine in Berlin. In 1843, he received his diploma, and began his long career as a teacher of pathology in the German capital. His sympathy, however, with the revolutionists in the troubles of 1848 led to the loss of his professor's chair. But the University of Wurzburg gave him a hearty welcome. There he made the great discovery of the self propagation of cellular tissue which laid the whole world under obligation to him. He was recalled in triumph to Berlin, and his name and fame have since rendered the University of Berlin the foremost of all medical schools. His eminence in the study of pathology, however, did not exhaust the energies of this wonderful man. He became a City Councillor, and later a member of the Reichstag. In both capacities he did excellent work, originating and promoting measures for the benefit of the people. Berlin owes its fine water system, its drainage system, and its splendid hospital service to his indomitable energy and perseverance. Besides all this, he was a great traveler and linguist, and was as famous as an archaeologist as he was as a pathologist. Though often in trouble through his opposition to Bismarck, he was honored throughout Germany, and venerated the world over. He leaves behind him a whole library of books, written at intervals during his busy career, which are invaluable to physicians and students. No man of our time has rendered services of such value to the health of the world or has better deserved the eulogium pronounced by the Apostle on Israel's ancient King:

After he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep (Acts 13: 36).

cross to the other side of the road. He had to pass over the tracks of the trolley car line. As he did so a car laden with passengers came swiftly down the hill and crashed into the President's carriage as it was passing diagonally over the tracks. The carriage was completely wrecked and its occupants thrown out. The Secret Service officer Craig, who had accompanied the President as a guard on his tour, was seated on the front seat beside the driver. Both men were flung to the road, and Craig, falling on the tracks, was cut to pieces by the trolley car and instantly killed. The driver also was badly hurt and was sent to a hospital. The President picked himself out of the wreck and declared that he was unhurt. It was seen, however, that his cheek had suffered an abrasion and was badly dis-

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPT. 28
READ DEUT. 8: 1-20; ACTS 7: 20-44; HEB. 11: 23-29

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- DEUT. 8: 18
"THOU SHALT REMEMBER THE LORD THY GOD"

FORMERLY history was little more than the biography of kings, but in this age of the people we have the "History of the English People," the "History of the American People," and so following the world around. In this quarter's lesson we have the story of the Making of the Hebrew Nation, in the wilderness school of Obedience, where a horde of slaves were developed into a nation ready to enter its Promised Land.

But, first of all, let us recall the leading characters by personations.

I am an old man. Being a shepherd, I have led a wandering life, and almost every foot of ground lying between Sinai and Edom is well known to me, for in those regions I have pastured my sheep, and have traversed the hills and plains by day and night in all seasons. My first acquaintance with Moses was when he was a fugitive, having slain a man in Egypt. But when I was persuaded that his cause was just, I permitted him to become a member of my family, and gave him my daughter as a wife. Moses would gladly have had me as a guide when his people were on their journey through the regions so familiar to me, but I could not cast in my lot with an alien people. What is my name?

I am an old man, eighty years of age. The Israelites are my people. I have still the courage of my youth. In all that long journey from Egypt to Canaan my faith in God has not faltered, and I have tried to inspire the people with the faith and courage which I have. But for this, they tried to stone me to death. My companion in these matters was Joshua. But even together we were not able to encourage the people in God, and for this they suffered thirty-eight forgave my sin, but I died the sooner for it nevertheless. What is my name?

I am an old man. God placed me in a position of great honor among his people. I was only a little lower than Moses. But I have not been a true leader, either in my own family or the nation, for I allowed my sons to make themselves vile, and I did not restrain the people when they would dishonor God, but I helped them. When God had them punished with the sword, I have often wondered why I was not also put to death. But I died the sooner for my neglect of duty. What is my name?

Illustration and Application

OBEEDIENCE IS THE GREAT WORD OF THIS QUARTER, AS OF THE WHOLE PENTATEUCH

1. Probably manna was a natural product, but the supernatural appears (1) in the double portion every sixth day, (2) in that the manna in five days would not keep beyond one day, while that gathered on the sixth day, kept two days. This miracle, repeated two thousand times (Joshua 5: 12), was one of God's ways of showing that it is our duty and privilege to stop our bread winning work every Sunday. Those nations have the best Sunday dinners where there is the least Sunday work. The poorest nations physically, mentally, morally, politically, and even financially, are those that work habitually seven days in the week, while the Sunday keeping nations literally "ride on the high places of the earth" in fulfillment of God's promise (Isa. 58: 13, 14).

2. A most valuable leaflet, that can doubtless be secured on request with stamp, is entitled, "The Exceeding Love of God as Made Manifest in the Revelation to man of the Ten Commandments." The leaflet combats the tendency to regard this "moral law" as not binding in the original sense. We are to obey it, not as servants, but as sons, but we are to obey it. We have learned that a law is not an arbitrary rule, but a statement of the nature of the thing governed. The ten commandments are a statement to man, of his own nature. They were codified and proclaimed on Mount Sinai, but had been enacted in the act of creation. They constitute the plan on which creative will and wisdom made man—a code whose obedience ensures happiness, and the fulfilcomprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another as he gave us commandment.

4. A Jewish writer says of the pulverizing of the golden calf and scattering its dust on the water, that the people might drink it: "Moses desired to make the people figuratively swallow their own deeds." So today, we often speak of people having to "eat their own words." The children, at a Chautauqua, being asked whether it would not have been better to save the gold in the calf and put it in the temple, one replied that God would not wish gold to be used in his house or in his service that had been devoted to an idol. It will be well if we can make American children feel that wealth meanly won in a servile submission to our golden calf of commercialism, in haste to be rich, is a curse, not a blessing. Let us learn to despise dirty gold, however great the pile, and to refuse to receive ill-gotten wealth, either to spend on our own necessities or to use it for God's cause.

5. An interesting illustration of the great truth that every Scripture is profitable for conversion, or for Christian culture, as Paul declares, even the chapters that give minute details of the Tabernacle, is afforded by an English story of the conversion of a woman who was a household drudge. She was always sweeping and polishing the brasses, cumbered like Martha with much serving, and had no time to sit, like Mary, at Jesus' feet. Many times when invited to go to meetings she had said she was too busy with her house-years of wandering, and of all the number, only Joshua and I were alone allowed to enter the Promised Land with their children. When the land was divided, I asked for my portion where the enemies of God were strongest, for I knew that in his name I could conquer them. What is my name?

I was well born, being the son of the High Priest. I had three brothers, all four of us were associated with our father in the service of God's House. But one of my brothers and myself drank wine, and when we were intoxicated desecrated the Most Holy Place, daring to enter in where God's great glory shone, and where none but the High Priest was permitted to enter. What is my name, and what is my brother's name? What was our fate?

I am one of many persons who carry about with them a discontented spirit. I have chiefly been occupied in finding fault with those who were trying to do me the most good. Sometimes I have been the worst foe to myself, for when freedom, home, plenty and the blessing of God were close at hand, I was so cowardly that I did not dare to face dangers through which God had promised to bring me safely, and I whined, and rebelled, and was willing to return to the condition of a slave, from which God, in answer to prayer, had delivered me. What is my name? (This pictures not a particular person, but a representative Israelite.)

I am an old man. My life has been a most eventful one. I have known poverty and riches. I have been both a slave and a king's son; but I preferred to be with my own people, the people of God, as a slave, rather than be the king of idolatrous people. When in anger I slew a man, and was a fugitive from justice; friends were given to me in a shepherd's family. With them I made my home until God called me to be a leader of his people. He gave me my commission in the field, where he found me tending sheep. After that, God often talked with me, that he might tell me what he wished me to have his people do. He even called me up on the mountain many times that he might talk with me alone. He often talked with me, from the pillar of cloud and fire, in the Tabernacle, "as a man talketh with his friend." My hasty temper caused me one day to disobey God and dishonor him, and I knew from that time that I could not enter the Promised Land with my people. God ment of His true purpose. Their clear enunciation is therefore an act of supreme mercy and love. "Show me the man whose ancestors, paternal and maternal, have for ten generations kept the ten commandments, and I will show you the best brain and purest blood on the face of the earth."

3. The second half of the commandments, from the period after the word "holy" in the Fourth Commandment, relate chiefly to man's duties to his fellow-man in the workshop, the home, and in the community, forbidding what will offend against the universal brotherhood which God enjoins. All the world is now a neighborhood in accessibility, and should be also a brotherhood in mutual helpfulness.

A gentleman once said to Dr. Skinner, who was asking aid for foreign missions, "I don't believe in foreign missions. I won't give anything except to home missions. I want what I give to benefit my neighbors." "Well," the doctor made reply, "whom do you regard as your neighbors?" "Why, those around me." "Do you mean those whose land joins yours?" "Yes." "Well," said Dr. Skinner, "how much land do you own?" "About five hundred acres," was the reply. "How far down do you own it?" inquired Dr. Skinner. "Why, I never thought of it before, but I suppose I am half way through?" "Exactly," said the doctor; "I suppose you do, and I want this money for the Chinese—the men whose land joins yours at the bottom." Every Christian should say in a higher sense than the heathen poet, "I am a man, and nothing human is foreign to me."

The Ten Commandments Reaffirmed in the New Testament

1. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.
2. Little children, keep yourselves from idols.
3. Swear not at all.
4. The Sabbath was made for man.
5. Honor thy father and thy mother.
6. Thou shalt do no murder.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Let him that stole steal no more; but rather let him labor with his hands.
9. Let all . . . evil speaking be put away from you . . . and be kind one to another.
10. Beware of covetousness.

And if there be any other commandment, it is briefly work, to which she was needlessly enslaved. At last her husband, blessed at some revival meetings, got her to go with him. He was, however, filled with misgivings when the minister took a text about "silver trumpets" (Numbers 10) and preached a rather fanciful sermon. But a sermon or God's minute attention to small things was the very thing to seize and hold her attention. The sermon closed with a reference to the trumpet of judgment: "The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised." The next morning she was awakened in a double sense by a long, clear trumpet blast, sounded again and again. She raised her head and then covered in terror, thinking the judgment day had come. She learned it was the revivalists moving their tent to a new place, giving their usual marching signal. But she had been truly awakened, and found time to "choose the good part."

6. The following is a good illustration, by contrast, of the fall of Nadab and Abihu, who probably learned to drink from their own father, as in this story an opposite lesson had been learned of a noble father. Colonel Fred N. Dow tells the following story to illustrate how the son of a father devoted to a great principle is likely to follow in his father's steps. Colonel Dow once visited friends at Quebec, and, while seeing the sights of the city and its surroundings, he took a public carriage to visit the Falls of Montmorency. At a half-way house on the road the driver pulled up his horse and remarked, "The carriage always stops here." "For what purpose?" asked the colonel. "For the passengers to treat," was the reply. "But none of us drink, and we don't intend to treat." The driver had dismounted, and was waiting by the roadside. Drawing himself up to his full height, he said impressively: "I have driven this carriage now more than thirty years, and this happened but once before. Some time ago I had for a fare a crank from Portland, Maine, by the name of Neal Dow, who said he wouldn't drink; and, what was more to the point, he said he wouldn't pay for anybody else to drink."

Moses' last act of obedience to God was to go up into Mount Pisgah and die. Let us obey God whether he bids us live or die. Let us not harbor the saying, "A man must live," which is so often made an excuse for sin.

We Invite Your Hearty Co-operation

Planning Greater Things

WE are about to inaugurate the most vigorous campaign in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with a view to greatly enlarging its field of usefulness, by means of a largely increased Subscription List, and we earnestly invite the hearty co-operation of every present subscriber.

A Fair Proposition

Indeed, we are sure that the tens of thousands who for many years have drawn inspiration and comfort from its columns, will consider it a privilege to render some substantial service to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will hail with pleasure the opportunity we now afford.

But THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is always ready to give generous recognition to each and every effort, kindly put forth by its subscribers, with a view to co-operating with the plans of its management. So to-day we come before our subscribers with an opportunity for service in the one hand and with generous recognition in the other, and we say to each and every one personally as follows:

Dear Friend,—We want your assistance in securing for us, in your immediate neighborhood, the names and addresses of 25 adult church-going people, no two of whom should live in the same house, but all of whom must be permanent residents of the town. We want those names for the purpose of sending these good people our profusely illustrated Prospectus and premium propositions for the coming year.

Stupendous Figures

We are planning to reach five million people. To do this will entail a cash outlay of over $100,000, $50,000 of which would be required for One-Cent Stamps;

but we believe that if we sow the seed bountifully, the Lord of the Harvest will give us the increase. Yet we would not waste a grain of this seed, as we learn that only that which falls on good ground produces a crop worth harvesting.

Every Subscriber a Friend

We feel that without the co-operation of our subscribers, we cannot undertake so great a work successfully. But as every subscriber on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD list is a personal friend of the paper, we know that we may confidently expect them to co-operate with us by best and richest of its kind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever sent out. You will find its description in the centre square on this page, and we guarantee entire satisfaction.

A Superb Christmas Gift

This Drop-Leaf Calendar will make a most attractive Christmas Gift, and we are confident that when it reaches your hands you will feel that our recognition of your kind co-operation is as generous as was your willingness to help us carry out the great plans we have in view for the enlargement of our subscription list.

We wish to impress on you one thing more, and that is, that these names will not be of any service to us if mailed later than the 25th day of September, 1902, as the preparations necessary for so huge an undertaking make it imperative that we stop receiving names immediately after that date.

Be sure to use the blank form on reverse side of this page.

Our 1903 Two-Century Drop-Leaf CALENDAR Free

A Christmas Gift Well Worth Having

EVERY Subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who, on or before September 25, 1902, will mail to us the names of Twenty-five Adult Protestant Church Attendants, and comply with the conditions set forth on the reverse side of this page, will receive, All Charges Prepaid, One of our Exquisite 1903 Two-Century Drop-Leaf Calendars, Superbly Lithographed in Twelve rich Colors and Gold.

We Invite Your Hearty Co-operation

Planning Greater Things

WE are about to inaugurate the most vigorous campaign in the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with a view to greatly enlarging its field of usefulness, by means of a largely increased Subscription List, and we earnestly invite the hearty co-operation of every present subscriber.

A Fair Proposition

Indeed, we are sure that the tens of thousands who for many years have drawn inspiration and comfort from its columns, will consider it a privilege to render some substantial service to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will hail with pleasure the opportunity we now afford.

But THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is always ready to give generous recognition to each and every effort, kindly put forth by its subscribers, with a view to co-operating with the plans of its management. So to-day we come before our subscribers with an opportunity for service in the one hand and with generous recognition in the other, and we say to each and every one personally as follows:

Dear Friend,—We want your assistance in securing for us, in your immediate neighborhood, the names and addresses of 25 adult church-going people, no two of whom should live in the same house, but all of whom must be permanent residents of the town. We want those names for the purpose of sending these good people our profusely illustrated Prospectus and premium propositions for the coming year.

Stupendous Figures

We are planning to reach five million people. To do this will entail a cash outlay of over $100,000, $50,000 of which would be required for One-Cent Stamps;

but we believe that if we sow the seed bountifully, the Lord of the Harvest will give us the increase. Yet we would not waste a grain of this seed, as we learn that only that which falls on good ground produces a crop worth harvesting.

Every Subscriber a Friend

We feel that without the co-operation of our subscribers, we cannot undertake so great a work successfully. But as every subscriber on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD list is a personal friend of the paper, we know that we may confidently expect them to co-operate with us by best and richest of its kind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has ever sent out. You will find its description in the centre square on this page, and we guarantee entire satisfaction.

A Superb Christmas Gift

This Drop-Leaf Calendar will make a most attractive Christmas Gift, and we are confident that when it reaches your hands you will feel that our recognition of your kind co-operation is as generous as was your willingness to help us carry out the great plans we have in view for the enlargement of our subscription list.

We wish to impress on you one thing more and that is, that these names will not be of any service to us if mailed later than the 25th day of September, 1902, as the preparations necessary for so huge an undertaking make it imperative that we stop receiving names immediately after this date.

THE 20TH CENTURY WIFE AND MOTHER

By MARION HARLAND

I. Called to Matronhood

GOD has made nothing in vain," is a truism neither the learned nor the illiterate will dispute. The more learned one becomes, the more fully one appreciates that everything is not merely beautiful in its season, but exactly adapted to the specific purpose for which it was created.

That intelligent people who do not dispute this great universal law, should contend that women and men are called indifferently to the work for which man is peculiarly adapted, and to that for which women are expressly created, would be ridiculous, if the issues involved in the misapprehension were less serious. The work of the world is to be done by both sexes, but each in its appointed way.

That anomalous monster of perfection has never been created, who can do all that devolves upon a man by the enactments of nature and of Providence, and all that devolves upon a woman. The man has not yet been born who, sane or insane, ever dreamed of undertaking the contract. There are so many branches of labor usually assigned to us in which men excel us, the wonder is we have not learned humility, and through humility wisdom, by the sight of their success and our shortcomings. A man can cook better than a woman when he gives his mind to it. He is a more expert laundryman; he invented and can run the sewing machine; he is a better house-servant than his sister; he designs our bonnets and cloaks, and when we wish to be particularly well dressed, we apply to him for tailor-made gowns.

Knowing these things—in addition to the fact that he holds supremacy in statecraft, and in the arts and sciences—it behooves us to look well into our claims to equal importance with him in God's great scheme of carrying on the world. Mentally and physically, woman is not a copy of man. She is his complementary self. What he lacks, she supplies. Instead of trying to make ourselves into poor imitations of our brothers, we should address our energies to the work of doing exactly what God meant us to do, and making ourselves the equals of man at his very best.

I have hinted at some things men can do better than we can. There are a few things he never has done and which he never can do.

Once, when called upon to address an audience of 2,000 working-girls, I said that a woman, supplied with a baby and a broom, could make a better home of a dry-goods box set up on end than the wisest man who ever lived, and with all "modern improvements at his command, could make of a palace." I meant what I said then. I mean it now. I longed—with longings I could not put into words—to awaken each one of those girls to a sense of her highest mission in life. I long unspeakably now to arouse each woman who reads these lines to full and glad appreciation of God's meaning in creating her a woman, and in this twentieth century.

Above the highest prerogatives of man; against his noblest achievement in Church and State and world; as an offset to his superb physical strength—the only thing, by the way, I ever envy in a man; against the physical courage that enables him to execute what a woman can merely plan—I place the incommunicable heritage—the crown and glory of womanhood—maternity.

This is the first of a series of charming articles from the pen of Marion Harland, on the "Twentieth Century Wife and Mother," specially written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

To make and keep a home is something worth living for and worth dying for. To fill that home with virtuous, healthy children, trained to do their duty to God and to their fellow-creatures, is to make and to mould the next generation. Much is said and written—and much of it is, I am sorry to say, the veriest balderdash—

Standing with reluctant feet,
Where the brook and river meet—
Womanhood and childhood fleet!—Longfellow.

of "making the history" of the age in which we live. The mothers of this day are making history for the next century to read.

Does all this sound didactic? It is, nevertheless, the most tremendous truth a woman can study next to the salvation of her immortal soul. This country of ours is to be peopled and managed by those who are children now. How it shall be governed depends upon the women who bear and bring up those children. The (so-called) Progressive Woman says magniloquently that this is Woman's Age and Opportunity. It is—but in a widely different sense from that which she intends us to understand. There was never a time since the foundation of the world when women had such large liberty and such boundless opportunities. The wife is no longer a cipher at the left hand of her lord and master. She is shifted to the right side, and should multiply his influence tenfold. Her education is equal to his; she has demonstrated her ability to earn the living her grandmother owed entirely to the one breadwinner of the family. She is perfectly equipped in mind, body and estate to be his true yoke-fellow. She studies at the same desk; she sells at the same counter; she walks the hospitals at his side, attends the same course of clinical lectures and consults with him in the sick-room—and all this as his acknowledged peer.

I wish I had not to say that the proud consciousness of this momentous fact has turned her head somewhat. I am ashamed, as a woman, to be obliged to add that the attitude assumed by many of my sister-women recalls Booker Washington's wholesomely, bitter admonition to his brethren according to the flesh and color. They have jumped too high, he warns them. Instead of following steadily and successfully the lines of labor appointed to them by God and nature, they have aspired to shoulder the white man's burden.

Our mistake has been in despising the end for which we were made, and reaching after (I do not say "aspiring" to) that which belongs to the province of our brothers. Instead of seeing in our superior educational advantages and enlarged freedom of action, so many helps in the mission of home-making and child-raising, we have come to despise this as menial and humiliating.

It is not the society woman alone who says, "One cannot make the best of her life if she has children." The student narrows her world by making study an end, and not a means; the philanthropist or the author rates the privilege of maternity as lower than her favorite charity, or the book which she believes nobody else can write. The natural consequence of this erroneous sense of the relative proportion of service and ambition, yearly leaves more and more homes childless. Yearly, the number of married couples who deliberately elect to live in boarding-houses and hotels increases, and this not from want of means, but because the wife girds at the "slavery of housekeeping," and longs for a higher sphere of thought and action.

Year by year, too, the spheres of husband and wife are separated by a wider gulf. "Why herein is a strange thing!" The higher education of women should harmonize the pursuits and aims of those whom God (or expediency) has joined together in wedlock. The home should be a school of nobler and broader thought, a domestic academy of science and art, in which husband and wife should be co-professors. A man should aim higher and more surely in his chosen profession because married to a woman of trained mental power and refined tastes.

A Western professor lately expressed the fear lest our modern system of education may lift the women so far above the men that marriages will be infrequent. I suggest as a mission for the progressive woman, the education of the neglected sex—after marriage.

A ROCK FOR HIS PULPIT

SEE ILLUSTRATION
ON FIRST PAGE

IN the sacred Gospels, it is told how Jesus, as he walked on the margin of Lake Gennesaret, followed by the multitude, saw two fishing-boats at their anchorage by the lakeside. Entering one of the boats, he asked Simon, the owner, to push out a little from the land. This done, the Saviour sat down, and from the deck of the fishing boat, "taught the people." That remarkable sermon on Galilee doubtless furnished the inspiration and the model for a series of unique and exceedingly picturesque gospel gatherings upon the margin of Half Moon Bay on the St. Lawrence River, during the present summer.

Half Moon Bay is a beautiful curve of the shore of Iroquois Island—one of the Admiralty Island group—on the Canadian side of the river. It is quite rocky in places, and at one point there is a shelf of rock which juts out into comparatively deep water. The bay is a favorite resort for the tourists, who skim across its dancing waters in light oak and birch canoes or in their sailboats and steam launches.

From that rocky ledge, for a number of Sundays during the season, the Word has been proclaimed in truth and eloquence, to a very singular audience. Using the rock as a pulpit, the preacher for the day, the Rev. A Gracey, of Gananoque, cast his voice over the waters of the bay, upon which rode at anchor sometimes nearly a hundred boats, launches and canoes, all of them filled with summer visitors. The doctrine is undenominational, and the rock pulpit is usually occupied by a new preacher every Sunday.

No more picturesque or impressive spot could possibly have been chosen as the scene of these religious services. Standing on his rocky pulpit, the pastor of this strange congregation first reads a portion of Scripture. Then follows the recital of the Creed, in which all the worshipers join, their voices mingling with the murmur of the lapping waves. The singing of Gospel hymns follows, Miss Grace Lalonde, a young lady with a clear soprano voice, leading this part of the exercises, in which all heartily join, the sound of their voices penetrating, in a delightful harmony, to the cottagers on shore. A mandolin and a guitar are the orchestra in this open-air service. Men and women remove their hats, and when the congregation is "fully seated" in their boats, the exercises proceed with as much regularity and reverent attentiveness as though the audience were in a cathedral, instead of tossing upon the waters of Half Moon Bay. The discourse is suited to the time and the occasion; the illustrations and similes are largely drawn from nature, as the surroundings suggest them, and the Gospel message and invitation are faithfully set forth to the attentive listeners.

It is now nearly a quarter of a century since the first religious services were held on the rocks of Half Moon Bay, with audiences similar in character to those that have assembled there during the present season. Mr. Samuel Finley, of Toronto, was the originator of the rock-pulpit gatherings. Dr. Cassels, of Rochester, was another of the pioneers in the movement to bring the Gospel home to the summer population, and he preached to many floating audiences, made up of cottagers from the resorts along the headwaters of the St. Lawrence. By and by the meeting-place came to be known as "The Church of Canoes," and the Sunday evening assemblies on the bay, in all sorts of floating craft—skiffs, naphtha launches, row-boats, sail-boats, and bark canoes—became a regular and pleasing feature among the summer guests. From two to three hundred, and sometimes even more, compose the congregation which worships in this natural temple of rock and sea, with its adamant walls and the blue sky for a dome. Who shall say that the message of love and pardon there delivered, may not have found a resting place in many a heart, and borne fruit in transformed and redeemed lives?

THE MARKS OF A FULL-GROWN MAN

A NEW SERMON BY REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, OF TOPEKA, KANS.

TEXT—Eph. 4: 13: "Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

NEARLY every boy wants to be a man. Almost every day my boy asks me, "When I get to be a great big man can I do so and so?" He wants a real steam engine, and a real horse, and a real bicycle. He plays that he is a man fully grown up. He wants to be a man.

REV. C. M. SHELDON

In every healthy nature there is a real desire for the largest, fullest development. It is a sign of happy, God-given sources of growth when a man longs after more real power and more real enlargement of all his being. It is, therefore, a great satisfaction to every thoughtful mind to find this natural ambition so splendidly anticipated in the Christian programme. A "full-grown man" is a part of the Christian plan in life. There is set before the Christian disciple, not a weak, sentimental, impractical, visionary appeal to a narrow, restricted, dwarfed or undeveloped career, but rather a magnificent vision of a manhood that can satisfy the most luxuriant ambition and stimulate the keenest longing for great achievements. One could not well devise a phrase more comprehensive and sweeping in its all-inclusiveness than the one in the text, "A full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ." It is to this definition of Christian manhood that we will bend our minds as we consider the meaning of it, as applied to the Christian energy of our times.

There are several characteristics of a full-grown man which claim our careful attention.

Faith Essential

The first is: Faith. No man ever grew on doubts. That is not the kind of food which nourishes life. Doubts are destructive, never constructive. Doctors say that every time a person gets angry, it affects the heart and the nervous system, so as to shorten life. In the same way, every time a person has doubts, the inevitable result is an abbreviation of the spiritual life. Doubt never built a cathedral. Doubt never founded a hospital. Doubt never stood by an open grave and saw the vision of an open heaven. But it has always been faith that has entered into the story of man's redemption and glorification. Listen to Tolstoi, as he gives his own experience in My Confession:

"However the question, 'How am I to live?' be put, the same answer is obtained, 'By the Law of God.' 'Will anything real and positive come of my life, and what? 'Eternal torment or eternal bliss.' 'Is there a meaning in life not to be destroyed by death, and if so, what?' 'Union with the infinite God, Paradise.' In this way I was compelled to admit that, besides the reasoning knowledge which I once thought the only true knowledge, there was in every living man another kind of knowledge, an unreasoning one, but which gives a possibility of living faith. All the unreasonableness of faith remained for me the same as ever, but I could not but confess that faith alone gave a man an answer as to the meaning of life, and the consequent possibility of living."

Paul was right when he said, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." And there can be no real life, there can be no real growth without faith, faith in the infinite, faith in the future, faith in the forgiveness of sins, faith in the redemption of the world. This is an absolute necessity of any full grown life, that it reach outward towards full growth through the "unity of the faith."

Another characteristic of this full-grown manhood is openness of heart and mind to the truth. A man's growth has stopped when he has reached the point where he knows it all. The creed which attempts to bound man's obligations and says, "Thus far and no farther," if obeyed, stifles the God-given ambition to know more and more of the infinite. It used to be said of President Wayland, of Brown University, that he learned something from every man he met, because he took for granted that every human being had learned something through experience that he himself had not had time to learn. A very eminent botanist, who had lectured many years and was counted an authority in his department, was once lecturing on the peculiarities of a wild flower common to the flora of the State. One of the students in the class came to him after the lecture and timidly asked permission to call attention to a peculiarity that had, he thought, escaped the professor's attention. The teacher, a man of great patience and uncommon gentleness, listened to him with courtesy, and was amazed to have his attention called to an alternate order of petal folding, which had escaped the notice of all botanists until the young man, a student, discovered it. Agassiz, it is said, was more than once led to some of his most important results by the suggestions of some of his youngest pupils. He never considered that he knew the limit of truth or knowledge concerning any animal or plant.

The student of social problems who thinks he has found the only solution possible for social ills, and will not listen to anyone else and will not consider any other problems but his own, will inevitably grow narrower and narrower, and in the end he will defeat his own object when otherwise he might have succeeded if he had kept his mind open to truth on all sides. Truth never walks into a man's mind through one entrance. It demands as many ways to get in as are gates to the New Jerusalem. Man cannot grow to his full growth on anything less than truth. Neither can he grow on anything less than all the truth he can get. That is a very sweeping promise of Christ's about the office of the Holy Spirit. "He shall guide you into all the truth." The Lord keep our minds open to his world of truth. Keep us from a narrow vision of the infinite.

A Generous Spirit

Another mark of a full-grown man is the absence of a spirit of judging. Perhaps when the Great Judgment Day reveals the deeds done in the body, and men are really known, and for the first time just as they truly are, more great tragedies in human life will be disclosed along the line of unjust judgments of our fellow beings than anywhere else. Oh, it dwarfs and kills the growth of the soul to pass careless and cruel criticism on our brother man without knowledge of motive, and purpose, and conduct. Think of the lives embittered, and soured, and wronged, and even slain ("assassinated" is not too strong a word to use), by the false judgments of men who, in their thus judging, have also slain themselves, for inevitably it follows that "with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you." The full-grown man may sometimes be obliged to pronounce condemnation where there is no doubt as to its being merited; but he can never pass unjust judgment upon his brother without forfeiting his right to the title of "full-grown." "Let us not therefore judge one another any more, but judge ye this rather, that no man put a stumbling block in his brother's way, or an occasion of falling."

Another marked characteristic of a full-grown man is obedience to God's laws, whether revealed through his Word, or through man's own experiences and sufferings. One Sunday, when it was my turn to preach at the asylum for the insane in Topeka, I asked the superintendent to tell me what to preach about to six or seven hundred insane people. He instantly replied: "Preach about the sin of disobedience and its results. They will understand that kind of preaching, as most of them are here because they have disobeyed the laws of God." The way of the transgressor is hard, but the end of it leaves the transgressor himself soft in mental and moral fibre, a weakling, a dwarf, a cripple, so far as achievement goes. Walk through the asylums and jails of the world, and count the melancholy wrecks of those who have failed of the full grown manhood on account of their disobedience. God's laws cannot be ignored or trampled on, with impunity.

Respect for Law

Disobedience to one law breeds contempt for all law. What can a people expect from lawlessness in one particular but lawlessness in every particular? The two vital essential habits that parents understand that children ought to cultivate are obedience and truthfulness. But if obedience is not taught a child, it is a miracle if he ever grows up truthful. The cry for personal liberty is a cry for personal selfishness when it is a cry of rebellion against all laws and restrictions. God obeys more laws than any other being in the universe. The man who is in chains to habit is the man who is exercising his personal liberty at the expense of some one else's development. It makes one indignant with righteous indignation to hear the plea of the moderate drinker that no man has a right to demand of him that he forego his personal liberty to drink, when we remember that in every age of the world the men who have at last become immoderate drunkards, began with one glass, and not one of them set out with the determination to be a drunkard, but every one of them scoffed at the idea that he could ever fall so low. Every one of the fifty thousand drunkards that die every year from the results of drink, began drinking with more or less plea for personal liberty and disobeyed God's laws in the matter, sinning against the great light of history and experience.

If this generation produces a future of moral weaklings, as far as possible from any full-grown ideal, it will be because it has substituted its own selfish commandments for God's, and turned its back on God's righteous precepts, and disobeyed the voice of the Lord. "Hearken unto me," saith the Lord, "And your soul shall live." But the soul that sinneth through disobedience shall die. There is no growth to manhood's height except along the line of God's laws. And his commandments are not grievous.

Another mark of the full-grown man is his daily acknowledgment of his stewardship. "The earth is the Lord's." "The gold is mine, the silver is also mine, saith the Lord." "All souls are mine." "For ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price. Therefore, glorify God with your bodies and your spirits, which are his." These Scripture statements sum up the political economy of the Bible. There is more true political economy in those few verses than in three-fourths of all the text-books on that subject that were ever printed. For, if once men begin to act on the truths of stewardship implied in the truth of God's ownership of everything, society will speedily witness a re-adjustment of its social relations. The full-grown man will, of necessity, believe in this teaching, and act on it. Talents, time, enthusiasm, ambition, will go freely on the altar of service to help redeem a lost world.

Once the doctrine of stewardship is accepted by the members of our churches, there will be no more cry of heartbreaking appeal for money to maintain churches at home and missions abroad. But God's money will be largely given out by his children who believe it is only by using the Father's money in this way that an honest stewardship can be maintained. If I say God owns everything, then I dare not waste his time in foolish or unnecessary amusements. If God owns talents, I dare not devote them to my own selfish development. If God owns influence, I dare not use it to build up anything less than his kingdom. If God owns me, I dare not sell myself to the devil, who has no right to what I have no right to let him attempt to purchase: I am selling goods which I have no legal right to deliver. The full-grown man is conscious of a divine ownership. The air that he breathes is the Father's; He made it. The earth on which he walks is God's. "God created the heavens and the earth." If possession is nine points of the law, creation is ten points. For to create is greater than to possess. And all things have come into being by the breath of his power. Let us give God the glory. The sooner we wretched braggarts drop out of our vocabulary the word "mine," and substitute the word "thine," the sooner we may expect to grow in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ. For he who reached such a divine stature, did it along the path of obedience to the prayer, "Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever."

Sympathy and Helpfulness

Another mark of a full-grown man is a personal participation in the struggle of the race for its redemption. If there is one thing more pitiable than any other in all creation, it is the sight of a man or woman standing outside of the whole struggle for better things and criticizing and finding fault with everybody who is at work. Our friends, the good moral people of the world, need some preaching right here. A self-satisfied, moral man says: "I don't make any professions, I don't pretend to be a Christian." But why don't you, my friend? What right have you to sneer at the people who have made professions? Isn't it everybody's duty to make professions? And, in any case, will you tell us who are the people who to-day are bearing the brunt of the world's heavy work? Who are the people who are using time and talents and means and self to help make a better world? Are they the people who are looking on at the sin and the sorrow and the wrong and the injustice, and criticizing it; are they the people who are in the middle of the contest, fighting the good fight of the faith, giving a helping hand here, raising a fallen brother there, making mistakes themselves, far from perfect even as you are, my moral brother; but, nevertheless, in some degree at least, personally identified with the divine movement for the world's regeneration.

I sometimes think God's indignation will at the last go out stronger towards the moral people who hold aloof from the earthly struggle, than towards sinners of a coarser character. Jesus said to the respectable scribes and Pharisees: "Woe unto you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, because ye shut the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye enter not in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering in to enter" (Matt. 23: 13). "Verily, I say unto you the publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you." That sounds almost harsh as coming from Jesus Christ. And yet it was only the divine indignation caused by seeing men who posed as great moral leaders in society, really blocking the path of all progress because they would not sacrifice themselves, even by so much as lifting a finger to raise the burden from humanity. The people who spend their lives outside the church criticizing the hypocrites inside, who never cease to remember every slight, real or fancied, and every injustice they have received from the professing Christian, while they never remember the multitude of good things done by church members and professing Christians in all the ages; the people who sneer at Christians' mistakes and call attention to their shortcomings, while at the same time they do not have any personal share in the great world struggle at any point where it really costs something—these are people whom Christ will judge at the last great day with righteous judgment.

"OUR OWN HOME FOLK"

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Great Healer

WHEN our Lord was on earth, walking up and down the hills of that land which ever since men have called holy, he often healed the sick. Then, as now, this mortal body was often rent by pains and aches, burned by fever, or weakened by infirmity. All through Galilee and Judea and Samaria, and along the shores of the sea, and in the mountain ways, there were "sick folk," and their friends brought them to Jesus and he healed them. Often he did more. His blessed voice, his miraculous insight, his amazing love went deeper than the mere physical malady, and Jesus healed the sickness of the soul. He forgave sins. He drove out the demons of insanely evil temper. He cleansed the house, as well as mended it. The one whom Jesus healed, whether child or man or woman, was "whole from that hour."

Centuries have come and gone, and the world still has in it a great number of sick folk—of those who suffer, in mind, or body, or estate. When these are mercifully healed, as so often they are, it is ever by the grace of Christ, operating through skill which he directs, or remedies which he blesses. We yet take our beloved ones to Jesus, when they are ill, and when the doctor, with his grave face and gentle voice and professional acumen, feels a pulse, or takes a temperature, or administers a medicine, Christ, the Great Physician, is back of him.

The healing of His seamless dress,
Is by our beds of pain,
We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

How instinctively we turn to prayer in the hours of great anxiety. Profoundly stirred by our weight of desire, that presses down almost crushingly, the natural impulse is to lift our eyes to heaven. There is help. There is comfort. In the Christian's view, there is no other place to go. And many a man and woman, not a Christian, aloof from the peace and the joy that are a Christian's privilege, prays passionately, despairingly, entreatingly, when a precious life is trembling in the balance.

Sometimes it is not the dear Master's will that healing shall come here and now. Even to those whom he cured when he dwelt among men, there ensued an hour of spent force and ebbing breath, and they laid aside the robe of the flesh, and went to the spirit home. In that earlier era, when men lived and lived, on and on, nine hundred years, six hundred years, three hundred years, at last there arrived a day when they were not, but slept with their fathers.

If it be God's will to take our sick ones home, let us accept that will, as surely the best possible outcome for them of the event. With Mrs. Browning we may cry:

Well done of God, to halve the lot
And give them all the sweetness.

"Thy will be done," cries God's child, and on that pillow lays her head, and realizes that all is well.

There are good people, many of them, who mistake God's meaning when sickness comes, and meet it with rebellion. "Why this interruption of our plans?" they exclaim. "Why this peculiar trouble to us?" "Our house," writes a friend, "has been a hospital all summer. First one, then another, under treatment; surgery, trained nurses, antiseptics, the order of the day." "We had made all our plans to go abroad, but Marie was taken ill in June, and we had to stay at home." "We expected," I quote from another letter, "the very brightest and happiest year of our lives, and we have had the most wretched, forlorn and disappointing one. I wonder why?"

Never let us wonder why. God knows, and that is sufficient. In the day-by-day allotment of the universe, God never forgets the individual. Each of us counts. Well or ill, we are in his sight and in his care. He will carry us through. For ourselves and our dear ones the child-like attitude is the best, "Thy will be done."

DREAM-LAND

SOMEWHERE beneath these earthly skies,
A land of wondrous beauty lies,
Wholly unseen by waking eyes.

Nor sun nor moon upon it beams,
Yet ever fair and light it seems,
The mystic realm of happy dreams.

Those passed from earth oft gathered there,
Each face familiar features wear,
No marks of death or grave they bear.

IN THE GROVE

You know all about the birds, Mother dear,
So, I prithee, tell their story now to me.
There's a bird that's singing up above us, Mother, here
Hidden from us in the branches of the tree.

The mother's hand years since grown cold,
As in the pleasant times of old,
In our warm clasp again we fold.
Within his long-time empty chair
The father sits, with silvery hair,
Above a brow enlivened with care.
The husband dear, the cherished wife,
Torn heart from heart and life from life,
Find sunny hours with pleasure rife.
The darling child again is pressed
Unto a loving mother's breast;
Again she sings it to its rest.
The friend we lost in life's sweet prime,
Smiles on us from that happy clime.
God grant upon the immortal shore
These pictured dreams come real once more.

FEW experiences are more ordinary than that of going to the photographer. The art of the camera has been brought to great perfection, and the expense has been lessened, so that people of average income can easily afford the luxury of being frequently depicted. Kodaks are snapped at one's friends and foes impartially, and every daily paper, as well as most weekly ones, has pictures of every notable person from queens to criminals. Nevertheless, most of us ignore certain important details and make certain foolish blunders as often as we visit a photographer's studio. The most common blunder appertains to our dress. Best clothes loom largely in our eyes when we go to the man with the camera. We put them on. They are usually stiff and shiny, or they are very much beflowered and betrimmed. They miss the note of simplicity, which is the cardinal note, when we are having a picture taken. They distract attention from the face to the garments.

Our second blunder is in adopting an unnatural expression. Do our very best, the second intervening between the artist's posing of us and his clapping the plate into his machine, seem like a section of vast eternity, and we grow wooden, we lose our own identity, we harden, we struggle painfully and confusedly to look pleasant; we do not succeed. Our efforts result in a staringness of eye and a fixedness of lip which are vacuous and disagreeable. Women suffer more than men in the process, for the severe outlines of masculine dress do not admit the inanities that characterize a woman's handsomest gown, and a man is somehow less self-conscious than a woman under trying circumstances. He does not mind the artist's critical and superior attitude, nor trouble himself for fear the picture will tell more than he wishes known about the sum of the passing years.

Among the details which we too often ignore are the color values, which ought to be studied; the fact that jewelry is apt to appear as a mere excrescence or intrusion, and that the extremes of fashion will look very oddly a few years hence. A glance at an old photograph album will prove the folly of wearing elaborate chains, rings, combs and the like, when sitting for a picture.

Not long ago a mother showed me the whole story of her daughter's life in successive photographs. The rich and beautiful life was ended, but the mother's heart treasured the mementos the camera had preserved. Here was the first baby picture, in long clothes; next the babe in her first short clothing, the child when she learned to walk, the little schoolgirl, the college student in cap and gown, the girl in her graduating dress, the bride, the young mother. Blessings on the art that can bestow such souvenirs on a household, that can show us our dear ones as they are in their happiest moments, that can confer on beauty an almost imperishable lustre and vitality.

Stop When You are Tired

Oh, if I only could!" sighed the weary housemother. "Stop when I am tired; how can I, with a hundred things to do?"

Perhaps you cannot manage a long rest, but a short respite, five minutes with folded hands, ten minutes with the feet up on another chair, and the eyes closed, will prove a real rest. Try it.

—ROYAL. Vines cost little and drape a porch beautifully. Plant perennials around your house.

—LITTLE LADY JANE. As the middle daughter, you are by the way of being the most useful person in the family.

—ETHEL. It is quite proper for a young lady to send flowers to a man who is very ill, if her acquaintance with him is friendly.

—MOTHER-BIRD. Let the children sit up an hour later on Sunday evening. It is the only day when their father is at home to enjoy them.

—MAY. Engagement rings are not necessarily exchanged. If your fiancé cannot afford a diamond, a turquoise or ruby ring will be equally appropriate.

God have mercy to-day on all the men and women in this city who are selfishly moral; who are willing to let other people bear the burden and heat of the day but are not willing to bear any of it themselves. God have mercy on you! Your souls will never grow on criticism and faultfinding and self-satisfied morality. They can only grow on exercise, on the contest itself. Come in from the outside, my brother, my sister, come and help; don't sit still and hinder. It is none of your business to do nothing because some feeble souls fail in perfection, because some church members are not all they ought to be. It is your business to do your part regardless of anyone else. You are going to be judged by what you do, not by what your neighbor does. Have a share in the conflict of the ages. Be a participant, not a looker-on.

Another mark of the full-grown man is his steadfastness in overcoming. "For in due season we shall reap if we faint not." "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life." The Bible is full of promises to those who hold out. There is not a single promise to the soul that gives up before it has used its powers to the utmost. Many a church has gone to pieces because it hadn't courage and patience enough to hold out in times of some special stress of circumstances. Many a minister has resigned and gone to another field to find another set of troubles like the one he left because he hadn't the grace of overcoming. Many a Sunday School teacher has given up his class because he did not see immediate results. As if seed sowing and harvest time were identical. Many a young convert has started out with enthusiasm, and when tribulation or persecution arises he is offended and falls away.

The crowning mark of the full-grown man is love. Love is the balance wheel of all the other Christian graces. A man may be a courageous Christian and at the same time lose his temper every day with his wife. A man may be a self-denying Christian and at the same time a selfish critic of other people. A woman may be a good working Christian in a church and at the same time carelessly use her tongue in gossip so as to destroy all the church work which she does. But if love is a ruling principle in the Christian the courageous disciple will control his temper; the critic will cease judging others unjustly, the gossip will be silent unless she has some good thing to say of a neighbor.

The new century demands full-grown men. If Christianity is to enter on a period of expansion, if the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of our Lord, it will not be brought about through church members who are so weak and undeveloped that the minister has got to spend the greater part of his strength in keeping them from quarreling with one another. Neither will it be brought about by a ministry that complains more of its hardships than it rejoices in its opportunities, or wastes its energies in trying to tell a hungry parish why Moses didn't write Deuteronomy. The Kingdom of God will make enormous gain in this century if Christians stop playing at Christianity and begin to work at it. The confines of God's reign will expand with miraculous speed when pew and pulpit combine their energies, not around the upholstery details of church worship but about the salvation of the world. The Christian standard of manhood is a high one. Thank God it is. The programme of Christianity is not made out for a pleasure trip, but it is made out for the conquest of new territory. There are forests to cut down, rivers to ford and bridge, virgin soil to be ploughed for the first time, houses to be built, savages to be tamed, wild beasts to drive out, the peace of civilization to bring in. A glorious programme of expansion free from the curse of physical war and injustice is to mark the Kingdom of God in this century. If we want a hand in it we must act like men who have serious, noble, glorious business on hand. It is not child's play. It is full-grown man's work. The God who made us in his own image inspire us to do his will with God-like enthusiasm. The world needs strong, intelligent, uncompromising, steadfast, overcoming, loving Christians. Not babes after all these centuries, but heroes, able to do things and eager to do them. The pattern is Christ. And the motto of this full grown man is the cry of Paul, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

The Lord needs men of might
To bring His kingdom in,
To magnify the right,
And overthrow the sin.
Exalt thyself, my soul,
Let nothing daunt thy heart;
Arise and let the whole
Of manhood play its part;
Forget the past that's gone,
With all its loss and tears,
And forward press thou on,
Before thee are God's years;
And thou shalt win the prize
That He shall give
To all who overcome, at last,
And like Him live.

LITTLE HATTIE'S FIFTY-SEVEN CENTS

HOW THEY BUILT THE BIGGEST PROTESTANT CHURCH IN AMERICA

THE name of the little girl was Hattie May Wiatt. She was six years old. One day in 1883 she made her way to the meeting-house at the corner of Berks and Mervine streets, in Philadelphia, to attend the Sunday School of Grace Church.

But though the school was a large one there was no room for this tiny child. When she was told this the tears came to her eyes and rolled down her cheeks. Her little heart burned as she turned away.

At the door she met Dr. Russell H. Conwell, the pastor. He lifted the little one to his shoulders, so that she could see from the window how crowded the room was; that there was not a seat large enough even for her slim little frame.

"But never mind, Hattie," he said. "Some day we will have a church so big that every one who wants may come in."

The little one pondered over these words. She began to dry her tears. She said to herself, "I will save my money, and then we will have the big church quite soon." All the way home she thought of this.

One of Hattie's possessions was a red pocket-book. It was old and tattered, and, what was worse, it was empty. But in it, penny by penny, the little one stored away her income. She denied herself all sorts of little luxuries. It may have been that she was tempted sometimes to break into her tiny hoard. But her heart was set on building the church that should be big enough for every one.

Days and weeks of planning, hoping and saving went by—and then, quite suddenly, the work stopped. The child was dying.

Almost with her last breath, Hattie told the pastor about the red pocket-book and the fifty-seven cents which it now contained. It was her legacy to the Grace Baptist Church. With a swelling heart and misty eyes the pastor informed his people of what Hattie had left for them. At that moment, the corner-stone of the new church was laid.

The pastor made no appeal for funds. But money was forthcoming at once. To the fifty-seven cents, one man added $57. To the $57, another added $570. A third gave $5,700, and then thousands of dollars poured in from all parts of the country. Never were fifty-seven cents invested so well before, nor known to bear interest at so high a rate.

Before long the funds required for the new building were raised. The original capital was never touched, but, mounted on cardboard, is preserved in the church it helped to build.

The auditorium of the Baptist Temple has the largest seating capacity among Protestant church edifices in the United States. It contains 3,500 plush-covered opera chairs, with room for hundreds of additional chairs without encroaching upon the main aisles. Its congregations twice each Sunday in the year, except in the summer months, average over 5,000. The temple is big enough for all; its doors are never closed.

1. Eastward, assuage, sealing-wax, tweak, twinkle. 2. Walker, rope-walk, reservoir, soda-water, workman. 3. Fuchsia, yard, hosier, currier, varying, carrying. 4. Superior, cameo, glorious, hideous, fume, value. 5. Wardrobe, washerwoman, waterspout, all-fours. 6. Wag, weekly, wicked, wimple, wombat, Wilkins. 7. When the Oriental heard the twang of the guitar, he walked to the palace, with the intention of talking to the musician who stood outside it. 8. He found the artist was not a strolling Syrian, but an Italian, who had made his way from Asia, and played appropriate music before audiences in the streets. 9. He seemed very youthful, although he had gained great experience when walking through many beautiful parts of Europe, and of Asia. 10. He was at one time associated with William, and was engaged in chariot races. 11. Then he practised assiduously in a gymnasium, was very abstemious, and became a noted athlete. 12. From some Belgians he learned billiards, and the brilliance of his play placed his skill at a premium; it will be admitted the Italian was a unique genius.

REVIEW.

1. Write the signs for wuh, weh, wee, waw, woh, woo; yah, yeh, yee, yaw, yoh, yoo, in position against the consonant t. 2. Give an illustration of the sign 'waw' or 'woh' joined to a stroke consonant. 3. Write Wilkins and women with the joined signs. 4. When may the joined sign be used, and when must the consonant 'w' be employed? 5. Give illustrations of the joining of aw and the logogram all initially.

AWAY TO MONT-LAWN

AWAY from the homes of want and care,
See the pale-faced children go.
Away to the "land of promise" rare,
Where the milk and honey flow.
Away from the slums, with their beer and their gin,
From the sights and the sounds of woe.
Away to the Home that will welcome them in,
Where the grass and the buttercups grow.
Away from the city's germs of death,
From its poison, evil and stain.
Away to the country's fragrant breath,
New vigor and strength to gain.
Away from the curse and the withering blight,
From the life on the pitiless street;
Away to the meadows so full of delight,
Where the waters are rippling and sweet.
Away from the school of vice and crime,
With its shameful haunts in view;
Away to gaze upon nature sublime,
And learn of the grand and the true.
Away to Mont-Lawn, with its sunshine and song,
Oh what are we doing to-day
To lead little feet from the broad way of wrong?
To the safe and the better way.

Answered Prayers

Mrs. D. M. H., Bristol, Pa., writes:
I have been greatly helped and encouraged by reading "Answered Prayers." For nine months there was no employment for us, and our way looked very dark. I earnestly prayed that the dear Lord would soon bless our efforts, and he has. This is only one instance. God has often heard and answered my prayers.

F. C., Humboldt, Minn., writes:
I had great anxiety—a great trouble on my mind. Looking over THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's "Answers to Prayer," I said, "Lord, grant I may have a telegram this day to help me out of my difficulty." In a few short hours I received the telegram. "Before they call I will answer; while they are yet speaking I will hear."

A. E. R., Winfield, Pa., writes:
I always read the "Answered Prayers" column; and I want to add my testimony. God has often answered my prayers, and I feel that each answer draws me closer to him. Some time ago I was tempted to do wrong, and I earnestly asked God to remove the temptation or give me grace to resist it, and he so plainly answered my prayer, I could not doubt him.

A DOCTOR'S EXPERIENCE.

Medicine Not Needed in this Case.

It is hard to convince some people that coffee does them an injury. They lay their bad feelings to almost every cause but the true and unsuspected one.

But the doctor knows; his wide experience has proven to him that to some systems coffee is an insidious poison that undermines the health.

Ask the doctor if coffee is the cause of constipation, stomach and nervous troubles.

"I have been a coffee drinker all my life. I am now 42 years old and when taken sick two years ago with nervous prostration, my doctor said that my nervous system was broken down and that I would have to give up coffee. I got so weak and shaky I could not work and reading your advertisement of Postum Food Coffee, I asked my grocer if he had any of it. He said, 'Yes,' and that he used it in his family and it was all it claimed to be.

So I quit coffee and commenced to use Postum steadily and found in about two weeks' time I could sleep soundly at night and get up in the morning feeling fresh and well. In about two months, I began to gain flesh. I only weighed 146 pounds when I commenced on Postum and now I weigh 167 and feel better than I did at 20 years of age.

I am working every day and sleep well at night. My two children were great coffee drinkers, but they have not drank any since Postum came into the house, and are far more healthy than they were before." Stewart M. Hall, Fairfield, W. Va.

Question of the Week

To what extent are such calamities as the eruption of Mt. Pelee to be considered as the direct visitation of God?

An Object Lesson in Divine Chemistry

God is a Spirit governing every atom of matter and using all for his own wise ends, never experimenting as a chemist in a laboratory. He has fashioned this earth for man's laboratory and given man object lessons. He is still at work upon the earth and pointing men to spiritual investigations. By an eruption at Mt. Pelee, he attracted the entire civilized world to himself. In that sense he visited the Island of Martinique.

C. M. SEVERANCE

God's Patience was Exhausted

The cities of Martinique and St. Pierre were undoubtedly the most corrupt cities of the present day. "As bad as the streets of St. Pierre" has been an expression synonymous of the greatest excess of wickedness. When any nation or people fill up the cup of their iniquity, and become a byword and a reproach, the time comes when even the patience of God is exhausted, and his descending wrath metes out the swift and terrible punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, of St. Pierre and Martinique.

ALICE C. BOYNTON.

Simply a Natural Phenomenon

St. Pierre was overwhelmed because it lay, unfortunately, in the direction taken by the gases, cinders, wind, etc., that were discharged by the volcano. No one would think of at-tributing the recent disaster at Galveston to such a cause. The one, as well as the other, aroused the sympathy of the people of the United States, and they manifested it in a very practical way. The eruption was simply a natural phenomenon and can be easily explained by scientific reasons.

WM. ROSCOW.

The Bible Alone Gives the Answer

The only place to find a correct answer to the question is in the Word of God. A careful study is necessary. The Bible tells of many such direct visitations of God's wrath upon nations and individuals because of their great wickedness. The flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the plagues of Egypt, the fiery serpents and other plagues sent upon the Israelites. The destruction of the Canaanites, Assyrians, Babylonians, and others. So of individuals. Nadab and Abihu (Deut. 10), Korah, Dathan and Abiram, and the two hundred and fifty with them. We must not, however, conclude that all such visitations are in wrath, and think that every one who is so visited is an especially great sinner, or, as some sincere Christians do, condemn ourselves and wonder what great wickedness we have done that we should be so afflicted, when we are brought into great suffering. This was the mistake of the three friends of Job who came to comfort him, but condemned him as a great sinner, when his trials were sent as means of a great blessing to him, and through him, to millions of others. Nor must we run to the other extreme, and say they are only the results of natural causes, and have no reference to the character or deserts of those thus visited. Such calamities do not show that those who suffer by them are more wicked than many others. They may be sent to some of the best of men for their good; they are punishments to others.

OLIVER HEMSTREET.

A Wicked Land is Accursed

Volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, and the like take place in obedience to the laws of nature, which is only another term for the laws of God. But God is not the slave of his own laws, but can use them as he will. He could have prevented the eruption of Mount Pelee. Inasmuch as he did not prevent it, the calamity was in a sense a visitation from him, willed for reasons that we cannot fathom. It is a joy to believe that the race will yet be regenerated, nations born in a day and God's will done on earth as it is in heaven. Who can doubt that with the spiritual regeneration there will come also physical renovation. The Holy Land once lay desolate because God's people had not kept his Sabbaths (II. Chron. 36: 21). Let the whole world become a Sabbath-keeping, God-fearing world, and might not God even modify the earth's climate and cause the whole creation, delivered from bondage, to cease its groaning and its travail? Rom. 8: 21, 22.

AMELIA HOYT.

Due to Natural Causes

They are direct visitations of God, in the sense that God does everything, whether it seems to be a blessing or otherwise. If we say that St. Pierre was destroyed because of its wickedness, we are confronted with the question: Why does he not destroy New York, London, or Paris, which are much more wicked than St. Pierre? The catastrophe of Mt. Pelee was due to natural causes, and the eruption would have occurred had there been no city at the base. Yet this fact does not deprive the occurrence of its teachings, for in it is shown the power of God, and his ability to punish for sin when the time comes. Perhaps the people who perished were no greater sinners than the rest of the world, but the lesson remains.

L. T. RIGHTSELL.

God is not a God of Evil

To believe such calamities come from the hand of God, would be to make him, not a "God of love," but a "God of destruction." The eruption of Mt. Pelee, like that of Vesuvius, came in the natural course of events. Those poor souls were warned of impending, possible danger, they believed not the warning. Were they wise in building cities and villages in so dangerous a locality? We do not escape these calamities because we are better than others.

MRS. E. RISDON.

Visitations of a Father's Love

He looketh on the earth and it trembleth; He toucheth the hills and they smoke (Psa. 104: 32.) If we acknowledge God's omnipotence and power in any degree, we must recognize it to be absolute. We can no more separate him from the calamities which visit us than we can from the blessings which fall like the dew. His visitations, however, are not always to be considered as retributive judgments. Neither can they be ascribed to accident, or the overrule of natural laws alone. God is the God of nature, and as such controls her in her stormy passions, as well as in her gentler moods. Holding all the forces of the universe in his hands, he recognizes the needs for rending a mountain in twain on the east, and troubling the waters on the west, or of opening an escape valve in some hitherto slumbering volcano, that thereby the earth-ball of his creation may retain its symmetry, and in its unerring revolutions bring to us springtime and harvest. As any inventor tears apart and re-constructs the machine of his ingenuity for newer improvements and better service; so God sends his "visitations," that upheave and devastate, for greater perfection in his loving purposes. All are visitations of a Father's love.

It Was a Punishment for Wickedness

If we take Deut. 29: 22-27, II. Peter 2: 6 as a basis upon which to rest our opinion, we must conclude that such calamities are on account of the sin and corruption of the people and are for warning to others. Why some particular places should be singled out to be visited by Divine wrath we cannot clearly understand, and because there are other places equally as sinful, people will not place credence in these recorded incidents of the Bible and take warning and turn to God. It has been stated that nearly the entire population of Martinique gathered in the public square every Sabbath afternoon, and engaged in all kinds of unholly games and sports, in violation of the Fourth Commandment and disregard of the promise of Isa. 58: 12, 13.
D. S. HARMON.

The Punishment Theory Refuted

While it is beyond the reach and ken of mortals to know with absolute certainty whether such calamities as the eruption of Mount Pelee are ever the direct acts of God, the probabilities favor the negative view. The forces of nature are under the control of unerring law. Hence the correlative terms of cause and effect. Scientists have shown with reasonable certainty that the disaster at Martinique was due to natural causes—forces acting in obedience to physical law. If the natural causes then in active operation had not culminated in the catastrophe which appalled the world, a miracle would have been wrought, as much as if a match were ignited in a keg of powder and no explosion would occur. If God employs convulsions of the earth to punish the wicked, why do they occur in every instance in places where the natural conditions are most favorable. Why do earthquakes always occur in the seismic area? And why are the materials ejected by volcanic action emitted through the crater of a mountain? God is omnipotent, and could overwhelm and destroy a city located outside these danger belts. It is hardly reasonable to infer that the most wickedness prevails at the latter points. And why is it that some cities are scourged and nearly depopulated by infectious diseases, such as yellow fever? Sin may be a primary cause, but the direct cause is due to physical conditions.
M. C. ROBERTSON.

God, Not Natural Law, Rules the World

As the material world is governed by natural laws every effect in nature has its cause, but those causes are secondary. The primal cause is God the Creator, upholder and governor of all. "He causeth the rain to fall whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy." Natural causes are assigned for drought and mildew, but God said, "I have withholden the rain, I have smitten you with mildew." Of the locusts, he said, "My great army that I sent among you." When Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown, it was God who did it. The secondary causes may have been earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. No doubt Pompeii's cup of iniquity was full when God overthrew it too. Natural law is not the dominant power in the world. From authentic reports, St. Pierre was an awfully wicked city. The blasphemous mockery of religion by its people was sufficient to bring down the judgments of God. And God overthrew it as he did the others.

Miscellaneous Questions

O. F. Milton, Wis. What authority have we for observing the first instead of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath?
We do not observe Sunday as the Sabbath in the Jewish sense of the word. It is not with us a day of rest, but of spiritual activity.

The old Jewish law was burdensome, as you can perceive by reading how Jesus was assailed for healing on the Sabbath. It was the subject of prohibitions and restrictions which were ridiculous. A man might not walk above a certain distance on that day, he must not carry a handkerchief or a cane, because that would be to carry a burden. He must not kindle a fire or do any simple duty. When the first Christian Council was held (Acts 15: 4-29) the Gentile converts were set free from such things. But the duty of devoting one day in the week to God was so clear that the Christians continued the practice, only they made the rest day a celebration on which they commemorated the resurrection of Jesus, which took place on the first day of the week. The practice begun in Apostolic times, as is proved by the Didache, or Teaching of the Apostles, has come down to us and is a distinctly Christian institution.

L. T., Washington, D.C. The question was recently put to me, "Are you saved?" to which I answered that God alone knew whether or not I was saved. My questioner said that if I did not know that I was saved, I was far from being a Christian. Is that true?

The statement is far too sweeping. We believe there are many true Christians who do not enjoy the assurance that they are saved. Sometimes their failure to have it is due to their own gloomy temperament, in other cases to defective knowledge, and in others to lack of faith. If your friend had contented himself with saying that you might know and ought to know, he would have been justified. You know the conditions of salvation; have you fulfilled them? If you have done your part by trusting in Christ and seeking to know and do his will, you may be quite sure that God will do his part. To doubt it implies a doubt of him. He will surely fulfil his promise, so that if you have given yourself unreservedly into his hands, you have the right to know and say that you are saved. If you have taken out a policy of life insurance and have kept up the payment of the premiums, you do not hesitate to put the value of the policy in your estimate of the funds your wife will have when you die. Having fulfilled the company's conditions, you confidently expect that it will fulfil its engagement. Exercise similar faith in God, and you will be a happier man.

Inquirer, Reading, Pa. It now seems certain that the Macedonian Revolutionary Committee planned, and probably carried out, the abduction of Miss Stone, the American missionary.

J. R. S., Roselms, O. The safest rule to follow in such cases is: Whenever you feel a conscientious objection, then discontinue the objectionable matter and take up some other to which the objection does not apply.

Reader, Minneapolis. To defraud the State is a sin and a crime. To do so that "good may be done" with the proceeds is false reasoning. Whatsoever is offered to the Lord should be without taint or blemish.

ONE YEAR IN HEAVEN

ONE year with God! Safe in the heavenly home!
Amid the throng of ransomed beings there.
No more a traveler on this earth to roam,
But sheltered by supernal love and care.

Sad are the lessons of our earthly life—
Lessons so hard, so difficult to learn;
But saddest one in all our weary strife,
That those we love should go and ne'er return.

But could we, for one moment feel the peace,
Or hear from heavenly choirs one glorious strain;
Or could we know the joy of sin's release—
We should not wish him back to earth again.

And though we know not why dark shadows fall,
Nor why the sunshine from our pathway goes;
'Tis sweet to feel that Jesus knows it all—
He sees, and tempers every wind that blows.

One year with God! The endless life begun,
Where all is joy and rest—sweet peace and love;
And when our work in faith and hope is done,
We shall be with him in the home above!

cottage home or the elegant mansion. To meet the needs of the small purse and at the same time give the rich, lasting, protecting effect of a first-class paint caused the manufacture of Carrara Paint, and it is the best paint for house, barn or fence; for interior or exterior work it has no equal. It is smoother, covers more surface, brightens and preserves colors, is used on wood, iron, tin, brick, stone or tile and never cracks, peels, blisters or chalks; it does not fade; it outlasts the best white lead or any mixed paint and it covers so much more surface to the gallon that it is cheaper in the first cost than most cheap paints. The following are a few of the larger users of Carrara Paint.

FRIEND OF THE DEAF-MUTES

IN the recent death of Rev. Dr. Thomas H. Gallaudet the "silent people" lost a friend who had devoted his life to their service; who had founded the world's first church for deaf-mutes, established a home for their aged and infirm, and enlarged in many ways their blessings and opportunities.

Dr. Gallaudet was the son of Rev. Thomas Hopkins Gallaudet, who, in 1817, opened in Hartford this country's first school for deaf-mutes. His sympathies had been enlisted for the silent folk through his interest in a beautiful young woman, who had lost her voice and hearing. To gain ideas for her instruction he had been sent to Paris to study methods there, and on his return to this country he determined to make the knowledge acquired helpful to many. He married Miss Sophia Fowler, one of his pupils, and the subject of this sketch was born June 3, 1822. After the younger Gallaudet's graduation from Trinity College in 1842, he came to New York and taught till 1850 in the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. Like his father, he married a deaf-mute and one of his pupils—Miss Elizabeth R. Budd.

While serving as instructor at the Institution, Dr. Gallaudet studied for the ministry; in 1851 he was ordained, in 1852 he founded St. Ann's P. E. Church for Deaf-Mutes. For forty years he was rector of this church, then he became rector-emeritus; and when this and St. Matthew's, West Eighty-fourth street, were united, he was rector-emeritus of St. Matthew's and Vicar of St. Ann's Chapel, which posts he held till his death. The Church Mission to Deaf-Mutes, organized 1872, owed its existence to him, and it was through this agency that churches for the silent ones sprang up in the West and South, as well as in the East. The Gallaudet Home at Wappinger's Falls, near Poughkeepsie, for aged and infirm mutes, was founded by him in 1885. But for this provision for them, the unfortunates sheltered there must otherwise have gone to the almshouse. In 1895, some 200 former pupils and friends gathered around him at the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and celebrated his golden wedding. Last year, the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination was made an occasion for formal rejoicing at the General Theological Seminary. His wife and six children survive him. It had been his fear that his offspring might inherit their grandmother's and mother's infirmity, but all are possessed of their full faculties. His brother, Edward M. Gallaudet, is President of the National College for the Deaf at Washington.

While the "silent people" on earth grieved for their friend departed, many whose spiritual ears he had unsealed in this life were greeting him, doubtless, with songs of praise on the other side.

Cheerful in Adversity*

Missionary Heroes Enduring Affliction in Joyful Fortitude

WHEN a man starts out on a mission of self-sacrifice, in which he has no hope of any gain for himself, but is impelled only by love of God and his fellow-men, we might have expected that God would specially protect him and would keep away from him the dangers that beset other travelers. But God does not act in that way. The good man is as liable to be hurt in a railway accident as the bad man, as liable to lose property or life by fire or wreck. It is not by granting immunity from injury or death that God shows his approval of the conduct of his children. This fact intensifies the heroism of the missionary. He knows that missionaries have perished in shipwreck, that they have died by the insalubrity of the climate in the region to which they have gone to preach the Gospel, and that they have fallen, as John Williams and James Chalmers did, by the blows of the very men whom they are seeking to save. Yet they go on. Never was there a place on the mission field left vacant by death, that remained vacant for lack of a volunteer to fill it. Why is it that courage so sublime fills the hearts of God's servants? Is it that they hope for compensation in heaven for the suffering of this present life? Such compensation there doubtless will be; but there are few of these courageous souls who draw their inspiration from that source.

The famous essay on Compensation would probably have never been written, if the author could have obtained one clear view into the heart of some veteran missionary. He rejoices in his work, and has all along the gratification of doing service which is greater than those know who have never made the experiment. There are three stages in the Christian's relation to the divine will. The first is submission, the second acquiescence, and the third delight. When this third stage is reached, outward circumstances can never produce depression. God keeps his servant so safely in his sanctuary, that he is untouched by annoyances and miseries which would drive other men to despair. It is true he deplores circumstances which prevent his continuing his work, as when Adoniram Judson was kept in prison for two years in Burmah, but even then he is conscious that he and his work both are in God's hand, and that all is well. The prophet said, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." That assurance has been fulfilled abundantly in the experience of many a man, who has had to endure trials, the purpose of which he could not understand. God disciplines his servants in many ways, and he who is willing to undergo discipline cannot be fretful when he realizes that God chooses the form in which it has come.

It is remarkable how much of our best treasure has come through trial. Germany might have waited long for her Bible if Luther had not been shut up in the Wartburg, at that critical time, when, to human judgment, it seemed most necessary that he be at his post. We might never have had the Pilgrim's Progress, if John Bunyan had not been imprisoned in Bedford jail. We can imagine that inspired writer grieving that he could no longer preach to the people; but his enforced retirement enabled him to minister to generations long after his life had closed. The service he could have rendered, if he had been free, was small in comparison with the service wrought by his pen while he was a prisoner. The Psalmist speaks of men who, passing through the Valley of Baca, make it a well; so men do who pass through the Valley of Affliction, if their faith in God's providence is firm. Out of the very trial they extract good, and turn to account the circumstances which seem evil. The possibility of doing this produces a cheerfulness which is the wonder of observers. The example of the Master in Gethsemane, praying that the cup might pass from him, but if it might not, unless he drank it, saying, "Thy will be done," is the pattern for all his followers. The cup is often very bitter, but when we know that it is mixed for us by a loving hand, we take it willingly, in the assured conviction that the purpose is well and beneficent.

Gospel Work in Honolulu

In a letter acknowledging a remittance by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in aid of missionary work in Honolulu, Rev. O. H. Gulick writes:

The contribution of $10 will be applied to the missionary work among the Japanese upon our shores. This work is conducted under the auspices of the Hawaiian Board, an organization which is the daughter of the American Board, and the legatee of the same. We have now sixty thousand Japanese upon our islands, the entire population of which is 151,000. Most of the Japanese are of the farming class, and, on arrival, are benighted Buddhists. Among them we have now laboring twelve evangelists, educated in the mission schools and the theological training schools of Japan.

A GIRL'S PROBLEM. How to Feed Herself When Running Down.

"I am a stenographer!" That statement brings up a picture of long hours of tiresome indoor confinement, close mental concentration and subsequent exhaustion and brain fag. Then comes up the food question.

A young lady in Dayton, Ohio, writes. "Some time ago I was a stenographer in a large city retail store and having the responsibility of the office work resting largely upon me my health began gradually to decline, and I stood facing the difficult problem of finding relief of some kind or leaving my situation. Worry added to my trouble; I became dyspeptic and nervous and suffered with insomnia and restlessness at night.

I was speaking of my illness one day to a trained nurse, who recommended that I begin a systematic diet of Grape-Nuts at once as she had seen its beneficial effect upon several of her patients who had suffered as I did.

So I began to use the food conscientiously. It formed my entire breakfast, with perhaps Postum Coffee or some other nourishing drink, and a second dish was taken at the evening meal. In about two weeks time I began to feel stronger and more hopeful; my digestion and appetite were better; I was less nervous and could sleep. I continued the diet steadily, and soon courage and vitality began to revive and once more I began to think success lay somewhere in this big world for me.

My work grew smoother and easier, and after seven months of this diet I could do almost twice the amount of work in a day and do it easily and without feeling exhausted.

To-day I am filling a much more responsible position and do the work easily and satisfactorily. I attribute it all to Grape-Nuts which I still continue to use. For a palatable and healthful diet, there is nothing on the market to equal it, and the fact should become of common knowledge." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

AN UNGRATEFUL PEOPLE

Exceptional Privileges
Required by Desertion

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

MOSES was the only man of the Old Testament who, inspired by the Holy Ghost, could say of the coming Messiah: "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me"—prophecy fulfilled in Christ (Acts 7: 37; Deut. 18: 15). God manifested himself in giving food from heaven and water out of the stony rock, when Moses, who knew God's ways, trusted him, while the people, who knew his works only (Ps. 103: 7), murmured and feared for their lives as much as though God had never made him his mighty arm amongst them. How he teaches us that not head knowledge of God, and no sign or wonder which we may see him do, will suffice to create in us that confidence in him which can sustain us under severe testing. It is only real, personal acquaintance with his character, through real face to face communion, which makes us count on God.

At Mount Sinai, God taught the people his holy law, amid the terrors of the mountain shaking and burning with fire, out of which the voice of God spoke. God expects from man: That he shall be impure; that no other god, no likeness of himself or of another shall be made by man to worship, and that his name shall not be taken in vain, for it is holy; and his involves his character, which his name implies. To doubt God is to take his name in vain; to disobey God is to take his name in vain; to worship God only in outward form is to treat him as though he were a senseless image: this, also, is to take his name in vain. And we are to allow the day on which God rested from his work of creation; it is his day, not ours. Moses included all these four commandments in these words: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6: 5).

God's law, regarding our fellow-creatures, also was given to Israel at Mount Sinai, in the last six commandments. Murder, adultery, theft, false witness, and covetousness, were riding rampant among the fallen sons of Adam. And now, for the first time, God made a law by which we might know what was sin in God's sight. These sins, which were being perpetrated in high-handed disregard of God, and in wicked and cruel oppression of man, were forbidden by the law of God. But again Moses sums up all under the one word, "Love": "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev. 19: 18). Paul beautifully states it thus: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore, love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13: 10). But the knowledge of the will of God in his holy law and the terrors of Mount Sinai, had no power to change the hearts of the people, for when Moses was absent from them, alone with God in the mountain on their behalf, they, with Aaron at their head, did just what God had commanded them not to do—they made a graven image and worshiped it!

What a proof is all this of the hopeless depravity of the heart of man! Paul knew that he wrote when he said: "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. 7: 18). And yet in their very midst was a man in whom the Spirit of Christ was beforehand (1. Peter 1: 11), who could trust God when they distrusted him, could obey God when they disobeyed him, and could habitually ignore their injustice towards himself, and lay himself out to intercede for them! What made the difference? The very failures of Moses, in the rare instances in which he failed, were evidence that in himself there was the same nature which the people possessed. But there was in him Another, in whom he habitually yielded, who lived another life in him. The same Paul who said: "In me... dwelleth no good thing," could also say, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who died and gave himself for me" (Gal. 2: 20). Moses understood the Passover; he knew the meaning of the lamb slain for his sin; but he lived so in the power of another Life within,

THE TWO BROTHERS

HOW many milestones there may be Upon life's road twist Death and me, I cannot guess nor tell; But this I know full well, Somewhere upon the way I shall be sure to meet him; God grant me, in that day, With solemn joy to greet him.

He hath a brother, Sleep, Who oft to those who weep, Doth grant a sweet release, A breathing time of peace.

This one I often meet, But, O! to greet the other, Who giveth calm more sweet, Than e'en his mystic brother.

With golden dreams for me, This one at evening waits; But, ah! to grand reality, The other opes the gates; The pearly gates that guard The New Jerusalem.

Where angel bands keep watch and ward, And bid us come to them. Then, let us bless the Lord, For there his angels twain, Each flying hither at his word To give surcease of pain.

Chinese Breaking their Idols

From the Rev. Z. C. Beals, of Wuhu, China, the following interesting letter has been received:

"I have just used up the $100 you sent me from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund. It has been a great blessing. I supplied fifty persons (most of them widows who lost their husbands through the flood), for two months with work. This kept an averaged family of three, and thus the $100 kept 150 persons from starving for two months. We never can forget THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's kindness in coming to our relief. Many of the missionaries gave all they had to save them from starving, and now we are reaping results from it. I have one outstation alone, where the flood sufferers have been gathered in, after their return home, who now number over 400. They seem very earnest, and testify to God's love by sending the flood to show them how helpless their idols were. I hope to baptize very many this fall of those who heard the Gospel during the flood, and while in their suffering condition afterward. I have had given to me a temple, away up in the flooded district, to be used for a church and school. I will go to see them soon. They say they will smash the idols when I come. Thus the Lord is working upon the people's hearts, and that which appeared a curse is turning out a blessing. Again I want to thank you, Dr. Klopsch, for your personal interest in all the trying things which distress the human race. God bless you, and use you and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more and more."

The Converted Granite Cutter

In the city of Montpelier, Vt., an excellent Christian work is being done by the Union City Mission, an un denominational organization which was established some time ago by Mr. John Docherty, a young stone-cutter. A reader of this journal, M. A. W., sends this brief description of the Mission's work: "No salary is paid to any one connected with the Mission. The Superintendent works at his trade and speaks evenings. He has been assisted by Rev. N. M. Shaw, of the Evangelical Society. The Mission is supported by free-will offerings. Some of the business men of the city have promised to pay the rent of the hall. Meetings are held in the jail every Sunday afternoon, Mrs. Tracey, the jailer's wife, assisting the good cause by singing. The pastors of the city take an active part and assist the Superintendent."

WESLEYVILLE, PA.
I am permanently relieved of a weak and deformed spine, by the use of the Philo Burt Company's Appliance. During the six months previous to procuring the appliance, I was unable to stand on my feet. After wearing it for six weeks, I could walk with the aid of crutches, and eight months from the time I first commenced the use of the Brace, I could do as much work as any able bodied man. My experience has convinced me that spinal trouble is the cause of many symptoms of disease, that can never be relieved by treating the symptoms, and nothing but some support to remove the weight of the head and shoulders from the spine will give relief. I cannot say too much for your Appliance. They are so light and comfortable (and can be removed so easily) that it is almost a pleasure to wear one.

Mr. List writes the above after 6 years' experience with our appliance, the latter 2 years of which he has not worn any brace or support,

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

THE STRANGEST PAGEANT IN THE WORLD

It was the passing of Butrus Jureijery, first Bishop of Cesarea Philippi, and Patriarch of Antioch, Jerusalem, Alexandria and the whole East. To those who look to see the Gospel brought to the Eastern world through an awakening of the old Oriental churches, it is encouraging to know that even in these days there are prelates who are earnest, sincere and capable. Such a one was the late Butrus IV., patriarch of the Greek Catholic Church. He was no Protestant, but a thorough Eastern Catholic. Indeed, the first striking incident of his career was an argument with a Presbyterian Bible-seller, which argument developed into a fierce fistic combat, with the result that Rustem Pasha exiled both parties from their native town of Zahleh. Years after, we see Butrus in Rome, presenting a strange petition to the Vatican.

"We believers," he said, "build our church upon Peter, the first bishop, the rock, the holder of the keys. But the commission of Peter was given by Christ at Cesarea Philippi, on the slopes of Hermon. How is it that the see of Peter, the first bishopric of the Christian Church, has been allowed to remain so long vacant? Here am I, bearing the very name of the apostle, ready to take up the arduous labors which shall reclaim for you the long-lost fold of Peter."

The Pope saw the force of this position and consented to consecrate Butrus as bishop of Cesarea Philippi, or Banias, as the modern village is called. Then the bishop elect went through France, preaching a kind of new Crusade. His idea was new and striking, and it spread like wildfire. He appealed with such eloquence that the new diocese and its incumbent became known throughout the whole country, and subscriptions for the Bishopric of Banias continue to flow in unto this day.

The next scene was five years ago, when the bishops of the Greek Catholic Church gathered in solemn convention to elect a new patriarch. Butrus Jureijery was the people's choice, but the odds against him seemed fatal—he was too progressive, too honest. The Turkish government was against him, the Jesuit order fought him, the papal nuncio objected to his nomination, and the bishops, almost to a man, bitterly opposed him. The people rose against their own hierarchy, and sent word to the Episcopal convention at Serba, that the bishops need not return to their dioceses unless they cast their votes for Butrus. So, in spite of government, Jesuits, papal nuncio, and the very electors themselves, Butrus Jureijery became the supreme head of the great Greek Catholic Church, with its five million communicants, scattered over the Eastern world from Hungary to Persia and from the Black Sea to Upper Egypt.

He had been elected "the people's patriarch," and such he remained. A religious and a political power, with every opportunity and every precedent for enrich-who kissed his cold hand and prayed to the dead man, with absolute belief that he still could be their friend and protector and advocate.

The funeral procession was typical of his life's work. For the first time, all sects forgot their differences. Romanist, Greek Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Maronite and Armenian marched together; and as the cortege passed the Protestant Church, its bell was tolled, "in order," as was said, "that the Turkish soldiers in the barracks yonder may know that all we Christians are one."

It was a long procession. First came two or three companies of soldiers, then sixty gorgeous kawasses, children from the schools, black-robed Jesuits, mourners from the patriarch's native village of Zahleh, wreaths and banners from sister churches, then more children, singing a plaintive Syrian hymn. There were present two patriarchs of other sects, a dozen or more bishops and three hundred and fifty priests. It took twenty-five minutes for the whole line to pass; but even the Moslem women, sitting on the house-tops, seemed impressed by the silence and dignity of it all—so different was it from the loud wailing at ordinary funerals.

At the very last, came the patriarch, not lying inside a black-draped hearse, but riding in a gilded chariot. Bright wreaths and banners hung around, and Butrus IV. sat upright, in his gorgeous robes, his staff grasped firmly in his left hand, and a crucifix in his right. Such an exhibition may often be offensive, but this time it was very dignified and impressive. It was hard to realize that the patriarch was dead; he sat there so naturally, with his long, gray beard resting upon his golden vestments, and his large, calm features, seeming still to indicate vital power within.

There were long addresses, lauding the character and good works of the dead man; the bishops of the Greek church, who shortened his life, said masses for the repose of his soul, and then they placed him in a vault under the cathedral floor—still seated and in his robes of state. And there he will sit, in solemn, solitary grandeur—like some Eastern Barbarossa, waiting for the time when the love of God shall cause a new birth in the church for which he labored in his own earnest way, and for which at last he died.

"THE DEAD PATRIARCH RODE IN A GILDED CHARIOT"

The strange and awe-inspiring spectacle at the funeral of the Patriarch of the Greek Church, Banias, 1902

ing himself and his family, he remained poor and honest to the end. This means more than Americans can easily realize. Throughout the Orient, office is supposed to afford a legitimate opportunity for amassing wealth. Few ecclesiastics have died in poverty; yet, so poor was Butrus, that his own brother was unable to attend the funeral until a popular subscription had raised sufficient money to buy him a decent coat.

Butrus IV. was progressive as well as honest. As he grew older, he became more liberal. He entered into no more fist fights with his opponents; but personally he treated them with the greatest honor. He was the first patriarch to return the calls of the American missionaries in Beirut, or to visit the English colony at Baalbec. Indeed, of the seven head teachers in his own patriarchal school, four were Protestants. A thorough churchman himself, he learned to fight Protestantism with its own weapons—not anathema, excommunication, and seclusion; but education, honesty, progress. He presented the spectacle of a man devout at heart and noble of purpose, but the victim of prejudice. Such men, ecclesiastical bigots may condemn, but they are honored by all who hold character above creed.

He was loved by his people, and admired and respected by the members of other communions. But with his own bishops he had to wage unceasing war. The contest drove him into his early grave, and he died on April 8, 1902.

They clothed the dead man in his richest robes, put his official staff in his hand, and set him in his chair of state. There, for three days, all the world came to see him. There were consuls, bearing telegrams of condolence; Protestant missionaries, who had honored him for his honesty and bravery; careless young people, who were drawn by news of the strange spectacle; and thousands of poor folk,

LITTLE ANNOYANCES

TEXT, Eccles. 12:5 { "THE GRASSHOPPER SHALL BE A BURDEN"

A UNIQUE text, capable of many different interpretations. Some suppose the Solomonian "burden" of the grasshopper, or, more strictly speaking, of the eastern locust, refers to the nagging pains of the chronic dyspeptic. The locusts, properly cooked, were edible. They constituted one of the most delicate of foods. They were often served to invalids, and to those whose weak stomachs were unable to assimilate any other kind of diet. Thus, some commentators assert that the figure of the text is that of an old man, contorted with pain, because his digestive organs have given out. The dinner of locusts which he has eaten, instead of being transformed into blood, and bone, and nerve, and muscle, is lying like a lump of lead within him. Others assert that the text is the figure of an aged man, whose emaciated body, with its shrivelled limbs and curved backbone, has taken upon itself the form of a lean grasshopper. Thus, Tithonus, in his old age, was supposed to have been changed into this chirping insect, because the Greek gods who had promised him immortality upon earth, had refused to endow him with eternal youth.

But though many interpretations are offered to explain the meaning of my text, there is one simple interpretation which, I believe, will appeal to the common sense of all. Solomon uses the figure of the chirping grasshopper to illustrate the fact that if we do not have the grace of God in our hearts, there will come a time when the little annoyances of life will tease, and tantalize, and trouble us, even as the buzzing of an insect can destroy the slumbers of a sleeping invalid; or as the slamming of a door makes a nervously prostrated patient start up in fright, and bedews his cold forehead with clammy sweat. The wisest of all men seems to say to you and me: "The religion of the Lord Jesus Christ is just as essential for the little troubles as for the big, for the insectile trials as for the mountainous afflictions." The purpose of this sermon is to discuss some of the little annoyances of life, and to state how, by the grace of God, we may combat them. I want to present this theme to those whose physical and mental frames have been prematurely weakened, by the strenuous, hard-working lives they have been compelled to lead, as well as to those whose once strong bodies are bordering upon nervous collapse, on account of the natural approach of old age.

Annoyances of the Household

The kitchen and bedroom, and nursery and parlor of the average home, reveal many of the so-called petty annoyances which can render morbid and unhappy the minds and the hearts of the inmates, especially of the wives and mothers. It is the annoyance of trying to build a fire early in the morning, when the damper will not work, that exemplifies how the grasshopper may become a burden. It is the trouble of getting the children off to school at the right time, when the tired mother finds that her boy has worn a hole in one of his stockings, and there is not another clean pair to put on. It is the annoyance of hunting up a pair of scissors, which your little girl lost when she took them to make doll's dresses. It is the annoyance of having the butcher and the grocery-man fail to bring home the vegetables and the meats in time to be cooked for dinner. And then there is the annoyance to the wife of having her husband complain because his meals are not served on time. It is the nagging annoyance that comes every little while to all good housekeepers, of having a lot of people drop in for dinner at the last moment, when you are not expecting them, and when you have nothing suitable in the larder to cook for them. It is the same kind of annoyance that Martha, in the little village of Bethany, experienced when her brother Lazarus brought Christ and some of the disciples to the home. Or it is the annoyance of having company call, when the children have been playing hide-and-seek in the parlor, and have turned the furniture upside down as though a cyclone had struck it; or the annoyance of being seen on the stairs by some particular friend, when your hair is unkempt and your dress is disordered from working in the storeroom, or from packing, or from putting up lace curtains, or from canning peaches, or making currant jellies for the next winter's supply.

The housekeeper's little annoyances would not amount to much, if there were only a few of them and if these annoyances came but seldom. But the trouble with the burden of the grasshoppers is that this insect always travels in multitudes. They advance by swarms, by hundreds, by thousands, by millions. They travel in such great numbers that they make the huge monsters in the African forests turn and flee in wild terror for their lives. They will destroy every harvest in their tracks, and eat bare every tree branch. Their advent is a curse, and their departure nearly always leaves complete desolation. In the life of Sir Thomas Graham, the great financier, who built the Royal Exchange of London, we read that he was left a foundling in a country field. His mother was a poor woman who deserted him. Sir Thomas, as a baby, was discovered in that field, and his life was saved through the chirping of a grasshopper, which attracted a boy to the place where the child was lying. But that is the only instance in all history, which we remember, where a life was saved by a grasshopper. As a rule, the locusts travel in such swarms that their mission seems to be to destroy life, and not to save it.

The Unfailing Remedy

It is the accumulation of little insect annoyances in the home that wrecks the nervous systems and mental happiness of our wives and mothers and sisters, not the individual annoyances which may only come once in a week, a month, or in a year. Many a woman could bravely meet a great trouble in life. Many a woman could contemplate her execution, as calmly and self-possessed as did Nathan Hale, the Revolutionary martyr, who under the scaffold, with the noose about his neck, said: "The only regret I have, is that I have but one life to give to the service of my country." Yet the woman who could calmly meet a great trouble, would have her patience and her nervous system sorely tried, and her happiness wrecked by the sewing-machine breaking a needle, by the dough refusing to bake in the oven, and by the children tearing their clothes.

Wives and mothers and sisters, what you need to-day is the advice Solomon gave to the young men of his time. You need the grace of God in your hearts to be able to overcome the burden of the grasshoppers. As Jesus Christ turned to the angry and quick-tempered housekeeper, when she rushed into his presence crying: "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?" and gently said: "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things, but one thing is needful." So Christ says to every living housekeeper to-day: "You need the grace in your heart to overcome the little annoyances, as well as your great trials." Oh, woman, how different life would be, if you would ask Jesus to stand by your side at the kitchen stove! How different, if you would only ask his help when you are mending baby's frock! How different, if you would only ask Christ's help when you hunt for the missing silver spoon; if you would only ask him to help you to bear the burden of the grasshopper!

One day, a minister was visiting an invalid, who was noted for her great Christian piety and her exalted happiness, even though she had been bedridden for some years. He asked her: "Betty, how is it that you can lie here in bed and be so happy, when once you were so full of physical life and energy?" "Well, pastor," answered the Christian woman, "it is only because I am leaning hard upon the omnipotent and sustaining arm of God. When I was strong and physically well, I used to have a lot to do. I had a large family, you know, sir, of little children. Then I used to hear God keep saying to me: 'Betty, you do this; Betty, you do that; Betty, you do the other thing!' And so, of course, I did what God wanted me to do. But now, sir, as I am lying in bed, I hear God's voice just the same—the same sweet voice of the divine love. I hear it saying to me every day: 'Betty, you just lie here.' And so, here I stay, because it is God's will, and I am happy, very happy." Yes, the divine grace is sufficient to help every tired wife and mother triumphantly to bear the little annoyances as well as the great. It is sufficient to help a woman to bear the painful stitches in her side, as well as to help her in her domestic duties. It is sufficient even to enable her to bear the nagging and tantalizing and continuous burden of a great swarm of buzzing locusts.

Business Annoyances

If it is important for wives and mothers to have the grace of God, in order to overcome the infinitesimal burdens of the multitudinous locust, it is also important for husbands and fathers and brothers to have the same kind of Divine reinforcement to meet the burdensome insectile annoyances that afflict them in turn. It is not the droughts and the freshets, and the mortgage upon the land that wear out the patience of the farmer. It is the annoyance of the neighbors borrowing his tools and not returning them. It is the annoyance of the farm hand getting drunk in the midst of the harvest. It is the stupidity of the same farm hand in giving the best horse cold water to drink when overheated, so that the animal becomes foundered. It is not the big trials that wear out the professional man or the merchant. It is the misdirecting of a certain important letter. It is the rudeness of the clerk that drives customers away. It is the burden of the buzzing locust. Yes, ministers, and lawyers, and doctors, and merchants, and farmers, and employees alike, we all need the grace of God in our hearts to overcome the little annoyances, as well as the big trials of life.

I once heard of a prominent New York merchant who was sneered at by his business associates, and called eccentric, because every morning, before a yard of cloth was taken down from any of the shelves, or the front door of the store was opened to admit the customers, he used to call into one room all of his employees. He summoned them together, the highest as well as the lowest, the heads of departments as well as the cash girls and errand boys. Then, in that room, this great city merchant used to plead at the throne of mercy for spiritual help to meet the little trials and annoyances of the coming day. Surely if a family altar is needed in each home, around which a father and a mother and the children every morning and evening may gather, such an altar ought to be erected in every factory, and store, and office, and study. Such an altar ought to be raised by every father, and husband, and brother, and son, at which to plead daily for Divine grace, so that they may overcome the little annoyances that course about every active life like the burden of the buzzing locusts.

Carping Criticism

Many unjust and contemptible criticisms, which are daily made against us and our work can aptly be classed as among the insectile armies of the multitudinous locusts. A good, honest, vehement, healthy criticism ought to be spiritually helpful to the average man. It ought to act upon the ambitious mind and the spirit in the same way that a vigorous massage starts the sluggish blood coursing through the arteries and veins of our invalid body. It is when an army is invading a foreign land that the commanding general is most careful about his scouts, and sentries, and counter-signs, and powder, and bullets, and guns, and commissary supplies. It is when a man feels that he is completely surrounded by rivals and by honest critics, who do not believe in the way he is doing, that he puts forth his best energies and lives up to his highest standard.

The effect which the attack of an honest enemy ought to have upon our lives was once illustrated by a noted preacher. He pictured a flock of migrating birds being shot at by a fowler. At the first discharge of the hunter's gun, the migrating birds merely give a few strokes of their powerful wings and fly higher. At the next discharge, they fly still higher. At the next, higher and higher until they are out of range of their enemy's bullets. The true effect of an honest critic's attacks should be to make us fly higher and still higher into the spiritual life—to fly higher and higher until we come closer and closer to God. It was the attacks and sneers and derisive remarks hurled at the young statesman, that nerved Benjamin Disraeli to become the great leader of the House of Commons, and the favorite Prime Minister of his Queen. It was the harsh criticism of an English naval officer that made Admiral Farragut firmly set his teeth and lips together, and redouble his energy when he drove his wooden ship past the supposed impassable batteries of New Orleans. And it is the deserved criticisms of our enemies that ought to make us more consecrated to our life's work and more willing to make sacrifices to accomplish our object.

Moody's Rule

But there is a Christian, as well as an unchristian way of meeting the criticisms of rivals, and of those who are jealous of our successes. One way is to do as Plato, the great disciple of Socrates, did, when he was told that even the boys in the streets were laughing at his singing. He answered: "Then I must learn to sing better, so that they will not laugh." The other way is to do as Alexander Pope, the vain and super-sensitive poet of England, used to do. Instead of going ahead and doing the work that God gave him to do, and, on account of his enemies' criticisms, doing it better and better all the time, he wasted most of his life in bickerings and backbiting, and in trying to destroy the reputations of those who were attacking him. The one way is to do as D. L. Moody did. He made it the rule of his life to never individually attack a person who had attacked him. The more Mr. Moody was personally assailed and misrepresented, the more he would go to God in prayer and ask the Divine Father to make his life so pure and true that there might not remain in his heart any cause for the charge which his enemies were making. The other way is to do as many of us are doing. When a neighbor or a critic makes any derogatory statement about us and our work, we prove that we are not falsely condemned in all particulars—that at least we have the fault of retaliation, because we go hunting for the faults in our neighbor's lives, instead of trying, with divine help, to correct the evils in our own. Thus, my brother, I want you, by the grace of God, to rise higher and higher in the spiritual life, until at last you are at an altitude above and out of earshot of the buzzing sound of the locusts of fault-finding enemies. I want you to rise so high in the spiritual life that you will not care what people may say or think about you or yours, as long as you can bring these people to love and live for Christ. Humanly speaking, it is awfully hard to bear the petty annoyances of your neighbors, criticizing you, and saying mean things about your wife and children. It is hard, from a human standpoint, to refrain from flinging a stone at the locusts of evil nagging, which are buzzing about you and your loved ones. But by the grace of God, you can live down these petty annoyances. You can go on doing your work, even as Christ went on doing his work, in spite of the jeers and the scoffs which the Pharisees uttered against him and his disciples.

God's Approval Sufficient

If you are absorbed in your Divine Master's work, you will receive sufficient grace to make you indifferent to the little annoyances caused by what people may say against you. You will be like that gateman whom Major Cole some years ago saw in a Chicago depot. It was during a bitterly cold night. Many male passengers were grumbling and complaining, because this gateman made every one of these men unbutton his coat and show his ticket before he could go to his train. My friend," said Major Cole, "you do not seem very popular with the passengers of this road." "No," answered the gateman with a smile, "but that does not concern me. So long as I obey orders, I am all right. There is only one man whose good opinion affects me and that is the President of the road. So long as he is satisfied, I do not care what these people say." In order to overcome the locust burden of what fault-finders may say against you, remember, my Christian brothers, our duty is not to please man, but God, and God alone. After you are convinced that in what you do you are pleasing God, it makes but little difference what any enemy—man, woman, or child—may say against you or your loved ones.

The increasing signs of physical and mental decadence can also be classed among the burdens of the buzzing locust. The annoyance of feeling that your eyes are becoming near-sighted, and that you have to wear glasses and sit very close to the light when you read the Bible or the evening newspaper. The annoyance of having the eardrum refuse to clearly throw the echoing sound into the brain, as it once did. The annoyance of not being able to run for a street car, or to step off that car when it is in motion. The annoyance of having some young fellow in the car arise and offer you a seat, as though you were an old man. Or, what is worse than all, the annoyance of feeling that you cannot do as much work, and do it as quickly as you once did a few years ago. As your brain power seems to lose its grip, you peevishly place your hand upon your forehead, and say: "I do not know what is the matter with my brain. My memory seems to have completely left me. I cannot recall the simplest names or facts. I have to make a memorandum of everything. Even my children have to look after me now, as though I was a little child."

The Old Man's Burden

When the faculties begin to fail, and the hair to whiten, the burden of the locusts becomes very heavy to bear, unless a man, as a Christian, is walking side by side with Christ. Even the Christian will find this burden a heavy burden, unless he has an extra amount of Divine grace given to him. Mr. Beecher once said that one of the saddest days he ever spent was when the realization first came upon him that he was going down the hillside of life, and very soon would not be as physically strong, or as mentally alert as formerly. The Plymouth pastor said that this saddening realization came upon him one day, when he was attempting to dodge in and out of the carriages and stages and dray-wagons that were moving up and down Broadway. As he was in the middle of that thoroughfare, he heard a driver angrily call out two or three times, "Get out of the way, old man!" Mr. Beecher hurriedly looked around to find out what old man was in danger. To his surprise and chagrin, he found that the drayman was shouting to him, and that he and no other was the "old man." It is not a hard struggle to physically die. Dying is just as natural an act for the body as is the act of being born. But it is hard to grow old; to feel that you have to ride when once it was an exhilaration to walk; to know that the mind is failing, that the heart has not the old vigor, that the hand which once grasped and wielded the hilt of a sword must now do the small chores around the old homestead. It is hard to know that upon the trembling shoulders of old age, even the weight of a small grasshopper's body can become a burden, a heavy, crushing burden.

Yet, my friends, amid the decaying faculties of old age, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is sufficient to overcome the burden of the buzzing locusts. What was the testimony of the aged Thomas Guthrie, the great Christian warrior of old Scotland. Standing before a large assemblage of little children, he said "Don't call me an old man, as some people do. Why, I am as young and happy as any child sitting before me to-day. My limbs may not be as strong as they once were. One of my feet may be in the grave, but the other foot is planted upon the earth so firmly that its leg has sunken knee-deep in the clover tops. My hearing may not be as acute as it once was, but my ears are continually hearing the sounds of sweetest music. My eye may not be as keen to read a book, but my eyesight is continually becoming more inspired to see the beauties of earth, as well as the beauties of heaven. I am not an old man. As I approach my second childhood, I have begun to live a life of eternal happiness, and of never-ending joys." Study the faces, the beautiful, happy faces of the aged Christian men and women about, and you will learn as never before that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is sufficient, even amid the decaying physical and mental faculties, to lift the burden of the buzzing locust. Oh, my young brother and sister, while you are yet physically strong, will you not take into your life this Divine power that will be such a mighty help to you, "when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease, because they are few."

Everyday Religion

Thus the burden of the locust is a very practical theme. The text teaches that though the Gospel of Jesus Christ is a good religion to die by, yet it is just as good a religion to live by. It means that we should take Christ with us to sing the lullaby to the baby, and to get the early breakfast. It means that we should take Christ with us to help harness up the horse and shuck the corn. It means we should ask Christ to go into partnership with us in business, and not have him be a silent partner either. It simply means we should have Christ as a practical helpmate during the week day, as well as a Sabbath companion.

When the great founder of Methodism was asked what he should do in the interim, if he knew that he was going to die at the end of the next thirty-six hours, John Wesley replied, "I would do just as I intended to do. I would ask Christ to go with me when I preached to-night. I would ask Christ to go with me when I meet my three different preaching appointments to-morrow, one in the morning, one at noon, and one in the evening. I would ask Christ to sit down with me when I eat my meals. I would ask Christ to guard me when I sleep both to-night and to-morrow night, and then I would wake up in glory." Like John Wesley, in the every-day duties of life, in the eating and work and sleeping, as well as in the prayer-meeting, will you ask the dear Christ to help you lift the different infinitesimal burdens of a swarm of irritating locusts?

A · NEW · SOUTHERN · EVANGELISTIC · MOVEMENT

A MOVEMENT, which may yet prove to be of great spiritual importance in the South, was inaugurated at Davidson, N. C., recently. Pursuant to a resolution passed by the Synod of North Carolina, in 1901, the First Annual Presbyterian Evangelistic and Biblical Institute convened at Davidson, N. C., on June 24 last. Rev. E. C. Gillespie, chairman of the committee appointed by Synod, called the assembly to order. Rev. Charles W. Robinson conducted the opening prayer service for God's blessing on all the deliberations of the Institute. All meetings were presided over by the Rev. William Black, president. There was an average attendance of from two to three hundred delegates, and probably as many visitors, some from long distances. Historic old Davidson College was the scene of the gathering, which, in many respects, was one of the most notable in the story of the Presbyterian Church in the South. Ministers, laymen, Sunday School workers, and home and foreign missionaries, were all included among the delegates. Twelve States and two foreign countries were represented.

Many of the addresses were of a high spiritual order, and also contained much that is of practical value in the line of suggestions for evangelistic work. Rev. Dr. Mcclure of Wilmington, N. C., Dr. I. Vance, of Newark, N. J., and Dr. Homerton, of Charlotte, N. C., were among the leading speakers. All the addresses were calculated to inspire the delegates with a new spirit in life, and a determination to be real workers in Christ's service. Rev. Thornwell Jacobs pleaded eloquently for evangelistic work by church members; not for the salva-ander White, of Lexington, Va., Dr. R. C. Reed, of Columbia, S. C., Dr. Givens B. Strickler, of Richmond, Va., and Dr. Egbert Watson Smith, of Greensboro, N. C., also took a prominent part in the Institute's deliberations. The venerable ex-president, Rev. J. B. Shearer, D.D., President Dr. Henry Louis Smith, and other members of the college faculty, and Dr. A. T. Graham, pastor of the Davidson Presbyterian Church, also gave presence and aid. The musical part of the meetings, which was most effective throughout, was conducted by Mr. F. H. Jacobs, the well-known Gospel singer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., sustained by an excellent choir. In beautifully rendered, sympathetic Gospel message was brought home M. M. Y.

The Gospel Yacht's Work

Many of our readers have desired to know more about Captain Benn's Gospel Yacht, and its work among the sailors at the port of New York. The yacht, with messages from Immanuel's land, is constantly plying among the seamen in these waters and distributing Testaments, religious papers and monthly magazines. Captain Benn gratefully acknowledges the receipt of many contributions of religious and other literature from our readers throughout the United States and Canada. The captain relates this incident of his work: "The chief officer of a large steamship came on board the yacht when we ran alongside. He wanted something to read. He said: 'I am a Roman Catholic and have never read religious papers.' I gave him magazines and CHRISTIAN HERALDS, and showed him a Red-Lettered Testament. 'I never had one,' he said. 'If I can have this I will study it.'"

"A week later I met the chief officer again, and as we both knelt in prayer in his private stateroom, he prayed for God's blessing on the kind-hearted man who sent me the Testament I gave him."

LIFE IN THE BEAUTIFUL CANARY ISLANDS

It is now two years since we began Gospel work in the Canary Islands. At first there were no workers but ourselves, but latterly an evangelist, one of the converts, has been our helper. The people are all pure Spaniards, and only Spanish is spoken.

"Here we have no consolation, and here is no religion whatever," said an old woman, "but the Senora comes on Sundays and teaches us about Jesus."

This woman bought a little hymn-book, and though she cannot read it, it is her treasure. Every Sunday she waits for us in the lane, and we read and sing. She is slowly learning the truth, and repeats while we read, "Jesus, salud; Jesus, salud." Some come around to hear, and a little seed of truth is left in their hearts also. The children crowd and disturb by talking all the time, as is the native habit here.

The simple Gospel is given, and free schools are planted in the neglected parts. Not entering into controversy, and overlooking the presence of the clericals, we itinerate everywhere with the Gospel for lost sinners. Marvelously the human heart responds, as the words of Jesus are read or spoken. Hearers come together, and the Lord blesses the word on the spot, many a one responding "Yes, yes." A prayer is taught to those who have never prayed before, save to images. One woman said, on hearing our reading, "There, I knew there was only God and Jesus," meaning that the saints to whom she was told to pray were of no avail.

If it were not for the priests, who hinder at every step and interfere in family life, the Gospel would spread in these islands like wildfire, and the Living Word would take root and grow. Their impious act of taking away the Gospels from the people and putting them in the fire, was of the nature of a fearful tragedy. In nearly every village we enter, the priest comes hurrying along, following and watching every step, and saying to those who are listening to us and looking at the books—"Children, don't buy; the books are bad; children, don't buy." But we go on, in the midst of such things, wearying though it is; and we are often surprised at the great joy we experience in this work. Nearly everyone who receives the Gospel does so secretly, and not before others.

A branch of the work is for kindness to animals, in which cause leaflets have been written and published. About 29,000 of these have been distributed. They have been a valuable help to the Gospel work, and have been the means of opening many hearts and homes.

We have an interesting little school in the Dragonal, (a village of cave people,) of fourteen boys, taught by our faithful evangelist. The walls are gay with forty bright pictures, and many working men come to visit this school, to hear the evangelist teach the Gospel. A school for fishermen's children was carried on during the fishing season, at Telde, with the result that thirty learned to read, and recite Scripture verses. A school of eighteen children is also held occasionally at the Puerto.

THE MISSIONARIES' HOUSE AT TAFIRA, LAS PALMAS, CANARY ISLANDS

CAVE-DWELLING, CANARY ISLANDS

Every week we visit the people of the caves of Atalaya, finding there the direst poverty and superstition. The children have no buttons, as a rule, on their clothes. Here, in this strange population, we have had our little school of six girls, and have also taken special interest in the two local schools.

We have seen our chief opposer, an educated man, become an earnest reader and teacher of the Bible.

Another young man, Antonio, received the Gospel warmly and with tears. He had been educated for the priesthood, and, at his father's house, had read some of the Bible without understanding it. Now, beginning with the Testament, he read diligently, and soon gathered a circle round him to whom he read and taught the truth.

The following towns and villages have been constantly visited; viz: Tafira, Santa Brigida, San Mates, Atalaya, San Francisco, Dragonal, Fondilla, Lomo Blanco, La Casada, Telde, Puertos de la Luz, Las Palmas, Guia, Galdar, and Agaete. These have been the scenes of blessing and opposition, joy and sorrow, reception of the Gospel and open resistance. We praise God for what we have seen, and we wonder if we have done all we ought. There has been a continual sale of Bibles, Testaments, and Gospels all the year, amounting to between 700 and 800 volumes. The making of fishing nets and knitted shawls has been taught to several. Services have been held every Sabbath. While many people read the Testament, only six or eight thus far give any clear evidence of conversion. But we have seen the living power of the Word of God; we have seen the tears drop on hearing a verse. Many are still bound down by Catholicism and its errors.

We give our warmest thanks to those who have so kindly recognized and helped our voluntary missionary work here.

He Was U. S. Minister, Not Consul

Mr. Editor: Please permit me to correct a statement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Sept. 3. In that issue you stated that my brother, Gen. Grant, appointed my husband U. S. Consul at Copenhagen. An unmarried man occupied that position all the years that my husband was U. S. Minister to Denmark, and we never met him at court entertainments, for, being a commercial agent, he was not eligible to court. Even the wife of the secretary of a legation, though she be a countess or baroness, could not have a private audience with royalty, because her husband did not represent the government from which he hailed. So strict are the rules of etiquette by which royalty is hedged about. In connection with my late husband's numerous literary and religious articles for American papers, and some magazines and quarterlies, he was occasionally referred to as "Our Minister to Denmark."

Yours respectfully, MARY GRANT CRAMER.

FIELD AND ORCHARDS OF PLENTY

ON FIRST PAGE

THE rich harvests of 1902 give occasion for great rejoicing and hearty gratitude. From mountain and valley, hillside and prairie, tales of plenty come. Such reports are particularly gratifying, inasmuch as ill things were feared and prophesied, because of the unusual weather of the past season. Now, it seems that the conditions we took to be harmful were in the main beneficent; and the temperate summer has filled our barns with abundance of grain, and our cellars with treasures of apples. Just at that point where rains and flood would have rusted the wheat, destroyed the rice and ruined the cotton, they were stayed; droughty winds threatening the corn were succeeded by dew-fall and showers, before heavy damage could be done. Unwonted chills in the air stopped short of the danger-line to fruit in the bud, and a goodly store came to perfection under the kindly sun. Our yield of corn is the largest we have ever had. According to estimates based on September's official crop reports, it exceeds a ten year average; is about two and a-half billion bushels against one and a-half billion last year. In 1901, the wheat was the record-breaking crop; this season's output is behind it, but is more than fair. The oat yield is enormous, surpassing that of all previous years. Rice, barley and flax are plentiful; there is cotton enough for our looms and to spare for export trade.

Back of our ever-increasing agricultural wealth stands something else besides good seasons and fertile soils. The moral and intellectual qualities of our farmers count. The American farmer is progressive; improved methods, and machinery, and agricultural colleges have his sanction. The social side of country life is undergoing swift changes for the better. Rural free mail delivery, traveling libraries, the farm telephone, consolidated schools, better highways, the bicycle, all contribute to deliver the farmer and the farmer's family from the isolation and inconvenience that have hitherto hampered the tillers of the soil.

Times have altered since Ruth gleaned for Boaz; have greatly altered since a century ago. Though a picturesque "harvest queen" may sometimes be seen amid the wheat, she seems a spirit of the past greeting a wonderful future. A mighty army of men—tens of thousands—sweep over our western grainfields, beginning in Texas in August, and ending in North Dakota in September. Moonlight and dew-fall permitting, the work goes on all night, with shifts every six hours; sometimes when clouds obscure the moon, lanterns are hung on the harness of the horses dragging the harvest machines.

The Psalmist's words of ancient Israel, "He maketh peace in thy borders and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat," fitly apply to young America. In blessing us, God has blessed the world, for by the fatness of our land are other lands fed—and not merely in a commercial sense; in their times of privation, they look to America, and not in vain. And out of the earth, the Lord sends our bounty to us again.

A Mountain Campaign

HERE, right at hand, in the very centre of the American Continent, lies a region which, to a great majority of our people is almost as much of a mystery as though it were located in Central Africa. Yet it is not an insignificant section of our territory by any means. It covers many thousands of square miles, from Pennsylvania to Alabama, and is inhabited by nearly three million white men, women and children of the Anglo-Saxon race, about one million of whom, we are reliably informed, are "without the Gospel or the means of getting it." This is the statement of a Southerner who knows whereof he speaks—the Rev. Edward O. Guerrant, of Wilmore, Ky., who is spending his life in the effort to enlighten the people who dwell in those beautiful hills and valleys of the Cumberland Mountains. They are a true, honest, industrious, brave people, who in many of these hill localities are almost totally shut out by their poverty and their rugged isolation, from the religious privileges that are now commonly enjoyed throughout our favored land.

It is doubtless owing to their isolation that the story of these Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina mountaineers is yet untold. They are comparative strangers to us, though they are our brothers and almost our "near neighbors." It is our privilege to reach out to them the hand of cordial greeting, and to bring into their lives whatsoever of joy, and hope, and spiritual helpfulness we may.

With this object in view, General Oliver Otis Howard, the distinguished Christian soldier, whose share in many a successful Gospel Campaign has endeared him to God's people everywhere, has been commissioned by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to visit the Cumberland Mountains, and, through these pages, to tell the world all about the race of hardy men and women who live there. Through his truthful and generous pen, the world will know what it has never yet known concerning the inhabitants of our Mid-American Switzerland. Accompanying General Howard are Pastor Guerrant, a Southerner "to the manner born" and familiar with the mountain people, and Mr. Geo. Stark, photographer. In our next week's issue will appear the opening letter from Gen. Howard, as Chief of the Campaign of Exploration. Others will appear in successive issues, and the whole series will form a story of most intense interest, full of local Southern color and rich in illustration. It is a story that should be read in every household throughout the land.

"The Smart Set"

ALL Christian people will welcome, with a sense of relief, the contradiction that Dr. Braddin Hamilton makes to the indictment which Mr. Henry Watterson brought against American aristocratic society. Dr. Hamilton's sermons on the evils of divorce, gambling, etc., prove that he is not a man likely to be lenient with wrongdoers, and therefore his testimony that the wealthy classes are not so corrupt as Mr. Watterson contends, may be accepted as authoritative.

Mr. Watterson's indictment sent a thrill of horror through all decent souls when it was read. He boldly charged the women as well as the men who compose what is known as "the smart set," with being lost to all sense of morality, with being vile in speech and in conduct, with "making life one unending debauch," with despising virtue, and with spending their money in the most degrading and debasing amusements.

It would be an ominous sign of approaching national decadence, if these charges were true. The ancient empires of the Old World began their decline in just that way, and in our time the moral corruption of the third French Empire prepared the way for Sedan. The true patriot, even though he might make no profession of religion, would have reason for alarm for the welfare of his country if he were convinced that the men and women of the higher ranks of society were such moral lepers as Mr. Watterson described. A plague of that kind is infectious, and it quickly spreads to the ranks of society which are prone to follow the example of people more wealthy or more aristocratic than themselves. Small reason, indeed, would we have to boast of our national prosperity if it led to lives of indolence and vice, infecting the lower strata until it met its counterpart in the lowest level of all in the indescribable moral filth of the slums of our great cities!

Dr. Hamilton admits that in the Society of Newport, to which Mr. Watterson's article chiefly referred, there are persons whom it correctly described, but he insists that they form but a small proportion of the whole population. He says they are tolerated, but are not respected nor accepted as leaders, and he instances many other residents who are leaders, whose lives are conspicuous for their high moral tone and their generous service to works of charity and philanthropy. We rejoice that it is so, and wish that even the toleration they give to the evildoers were withdrawn. If the real leaders of society would treat the moral leper as an outcast, the social ostracism might lead to reformation, or at least to decency. Our country has not attained its eminence among the nations of the world by the doings of evil men, and we may be quite sure that it will not maintain its eminence if its leaders cease to be moral. No statesmanship, no commercial or mechanical skill can make up for moral obliquity. It is righteousness which exalteth a nation.

Legislators in Trouble

HOW difficult it is to understand the inequalities there are in the human lot! Men who are not conscious of being exceptionally wicked, appear to be singled out for adversity. Why is it that some do wrong and escape, while others do the same kind of wrong and are caught and punished? This problem is exercising the minds of certain municipal legislators in one of our great cities. They had the power of granting some valuable public franchises, and it is alleged that they received, from the successful competitors for them, a private and personal payment for their votes. To their astonishment and annoyance, an inquiry has been made, with the result that they must stand a prosecution or abscond. One of them naively remarks: "We did not look on what we did as a serious crime, as it had gone on so long without interruption, that it was not regarded by those who participated in it as morally wrong." This is by no means a novel method of argument. Ecclesiastes in his day noticed that when "sentence against an evil work was not executed speedily, the heart of the sons of men was fully set in them to do evil." Unfortunately for them, however, the public argues in a different line from the same premises. When people have been wronged many times in the same way, they are apt to come to the conclusion that it is time the practice was stopped, and so they make an example of the latest offenders. It will be well if officials in other cities take note of the fact, and avoid the mistake of presuming that a law which has not been enforced for a long time is obsolete.

Open for All, and Always Open

ON the pillars on either side of the Beautiful Gate of the Temple of Jerusalem were engraved, in Greek letters, the words: "Let no stranger pass beyond this on pain of death." All Gentiles were thus shut out, and even Jewish women. But through the Beautiful Gate of the Gospel every one is free to enter into the holiest place. And not only so, but he can enter at all times.

In one of the great churches of Rome there is what is called the Porta Santa, or Holy Door. It is made of peculiar marble, and is sealed up for fifty years, so that no one during all that time can obtain admission through it to the high altar. In the jubilee year, the Pope knocks at this door with a silver hammer, and immediately it is pulled down, and a breach made, through which the Pope, followed by a splendid procession, can pass, and minister on the most sacred place.

Not like this Porta Santa is the Beautiful Gate of the Gospel. Not at long intervals is it opened. To every one who knocks, however feebly and at whatever time, it swings back at once and gives admission into eternal life.

"I never had trouble in recognizing my friends here, and I reckon I won't have when I get up there. If John and the others recognized Moses and Elias, whom they had never seen, we may safely expect to recognize those whom we have seen and known in the flesh."

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Lifelong Honeymoon

—AS YOU GET further off from that time when you took the vows amid the flowers and the music and the blithe hearts and the congratulatory assembly, and you come on to the time when that tender link will be broken against the marble slab, and between you shall open the rift of a grave—as you go further on in that journey, are you less careful for each other's welfare and less patient with each other's foibles? Has the caress become silly because so long the honeymoon has passed? Will there be a mound after awhile growing a harvest of nettles and nightshade, snake-infested devil haunted? Your larger house, your brighter associations, your greater prosperities, my brother, my sister, can not atone for the lack of that kindness which characterized you when you started life together! Then the tallow candle flickering on the homely stand was brighter to you than the light of a chandelier in an emperor's palace, and the evening meal to which you came wearily from work—and there was one at the other end of the table—had more attraction for you than the banquet where attendants lift the lids from smoking viands to the sound of well-drilled orchestra. Oh, is it well with thy wife?

A Bad Bargain

—I WANT to persuade you that this world is a poor investment; that it does not pay ninety per cent. of satisfaction, nor eighty per cent., nor twenty per cent., nor two per cent., nor one; that it gives no solace when a dead babe lies on your lap; that it gives no peace when conscience rings its alarm; that it gives no explanation in the day of dire trouble; and at the time of your decease it takes hold of the pillowcase, and shakes out the feathers, and then jolts down in the place thereof sighs and groans and execrations, and then makes you put your head on it. Oh, ye who have tried this world, is it a satisfactory portion? Would you advise your friends to make the investment? No. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought." Your conscience went. Your hope went. Your Bible went. Your heaven went. Your God went. When a sheriff under a writ from the courts sells a man out, the officer generally leaves a few chairs and a bed, and a few cups and knives; but in this awful vendue in which you have been engaged the auctioneer's mallet has come down upon body, mind and soul: Going! Gone! "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

The Millennial Peace

—AGAINST THE sky of the glorious future I see a great blaze. It is a foundry in full blast. The workmen have stirred the fires until the furnaces are seven times heated. The last wagon-load of the world's swords has been hauled into the foundry, and they are tumbled into the furnace, and they begin to glow and redden and melt, and in hissing and sparkling liquid they roll on down through the crevice of rock until they fall into a mold shaped like the iron foot of a plow. Then the liquid cools off into a hard metal, and, brought out on an anvil, it is beaten and pounded and fashioned, stroke after stroke, until that which was a weapon to reap harvests of men becomes an implement turning the soil for harvests of corn, the sword having become the plowshare.

The Sword as a Blessing

—THE SWORD has developed the grandest natures that the world ever saw. It has developed courage—that sublime energy of the soul which defies the universe, when it feels itself to be in the right. It has developed a self-sacrifice which repudiates the idea that our life is worth more than anything else, when for a principle it throws that life away, as much as to say, "It is not necessary that I live, but it is necessary that righteousness triumph." There are thousands among the Northern and Southern veterans of our Civil War who are ninety-five per cent. larger and mightier in soul than they would have been had they not, during the four years of national agony, turned their back on home and fortune and at the front sacrificed all for a principle.

Mountaineering Perils

SIX persons have recently perished in the Alps, all on the famous Wetterhorn, the peak which has a strong attraction for daring mountain climbers. Two of the travelers whose lives were lost were Englishmen, a clergyman and a civil service inspector. Each man had a guide, who shared their fate. The other two were a Scottish banker and his guide. A detailed story of the manner in which these two met their death was given to a local clergyman by another Scotchman, who accompanied them in their adventurous journey. He says that, steep as they found the mountain to be, that was not the source of the chief peril. They were in greater danger from the condition of the snow. The ascent was accomplished safely as the snow had frozen during the previous night. The scene from the summit was magnificent, and the two travelers, with their guides, stayed for some time resting and enjoying the view. When the descent began, the snow had become soft under the rays of the sun, and the journey was fatiguing. Less than half the distance had been covered when a cry was raised by one of the guides that an avalanche was coming. In two minutes the mass was upon them. It passed over them, throwing all down, and went rolling on down the mountain side. The man who has lived to tell the story hurried to the side of his friend, but found him dead, as also was the guide to whom he was tied. His own guide was unconscious. He was revived, but his head had been injured and he was delirious. From two o'clock until ten o'clock the one man sat there on a ledge of rock listening to the raving of the injured guide. At last a party of guides made their way to the scene of the disaster and carried the dead bodies and the two survivors, one of whom was almost dead, to Grindelwald. The traveler who tells the story says that those eight hours of vigil on the mountain ledge were the most doleful he ever passed in his life. Happily for him, rescue came in time to save his life. It was an experience he will probably never forget. The death of two of his companions, and the injury to the other, must have impressed him with the folly of voluntarily incurring dangers which could bring no advantage. Wise is the man, who, not only in physical, but in mental and spiritual matters, can say with the Psalmist:

My heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty; neither do I exercise myself in great matters or in things too high for me (Ps. 131: 1).

New Postage Stamps

The custom of the post-office department has been to issue a new set of stamps every eight or ten years, but the set now in use has been, with a few exceptions, unchanged for twelve years. Now, however, an entire new set of dies has been ordered, and one at a time they will replace the present ones. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing has, it is reported, surpassed all its previous efforts, and will produce the most artistic and well-engraved stamps in the world. One stamp is of an entirely new denomination. Its value will be thirteen cents, and will be used chiefly to cover postage and registration of foreign letters. It will bear an excellent portrait of the late President Harrison, with figures showing the date of his birth and his death. Changes are to be made in the portraits on some of the stamps of the old denominations. General Grant's portrait will be on the four-cent stamp, and Lincoln's on the five cent. Martha Washington's face will take the place formerly occupied by Gen. Sherman on the eight-cent stamp. President McKinley's portrait is to be on the new Postal cards. Franklin and Washington will retain the places they have occupied so many years. The one as the father of the postal system, and the other as the Father of his Country, are entitled to their places of honor on the most popular stamps. However long this country may endure, and however great her future statesmen may be, the men who laid the foundations of her greatness and whose character was spotless will be held in grateful reverence.

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance (Ps. 112: 6).

Overworking a Mine

The owner of several exceptionally rich mines in Mexico, is involved in a dispute with an American speculator and incidentally with a bookkeeper of his own. The of ore. He has, therefore, cancelled the lease and is trying to recover possession of the mine. He is naturally indignant at the advantage that has been taken of his kindness, for he is well aware that there is a limit to the treasure in the mine. If men would only be as eager to obtain spiritual treasure, they would not find God acting as is this mine owner. He reproaches them because they do not seek enough.

Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it (Mal. 3: 10).

An Indirect Assault

The Appellate Court of Indiana has just decided a curious case of a claim for substantial damages. The judge, in pronouncing the decision, said that there was no need to prove malicious intent. It was necessary to prove only that the act was the primary cause of injury; for the court recognized the constructive intent which makes a wrongful act wilful. It is well that this principle of law should be emphasized. There are so many people who make the excuse when confronted with the consequences of their own carelessness, "I did not mean to do it." Such persons may learn when the law holds them responsible, the lesson that the wise king taught long ago.

It is as sport to a fool to do mischief (Prov. 10: 23).

Looting Deserted Houses

Two beautifully furnished homes in the Bronx district of New York have been completely wrecked by thieves and vandals during the past week. Their owners have lodges in the Adirondacks, to which they went in the early summer with their families. One of them returning to the city on business, went to his home to see that it was put in order, ready for the return of the family. He was shocked at finding that it had been desolated by thieves, who had carried off all the valuables which were portable and had broken into his wine-cellar, where a large supply of choice wines were stored. They had apparently drunk themselves into a state of intoxication, and in their drunken delirium had amused themselves by destroying such property as they could not carry away. Pictures of great value had been cut into ribbons; clocks of rare workmanship had been spoiled; old china smashed and the furniture chopped and hacked with an axe. His neighbor's house had been similarly wrecked and the furnishings ruthlessly destroyed. It may be hoped that the wicked vandals who worked the destruction, will be caught and severely punished. They were doubtless aware that the owners of the mansions were absent. The havoc they did is a vivid reminder of the picture Christ drew of the mischief wrought in the soul, when God, its true owner, is excluded from its possession.

When he cometh he findeth it swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh to him seven other spirits, and they enter in and dwell there and the last state of that man is worse than the first (Luke 11: 25, 26).

BRIEF NOTES

The Baptist Foreign Missionary Societies are enjoying a time of harvest. In the seven missions they have now 111,650 communicants. Of this multitude 41,147 are found in Burma, and 55,210 in South India among the Telugus. The baptisms were 8,477 last year.

Protestantism is making progress in France. Pastor Charles Merle D'Aubigne says: "In 1835 Paris had only ten Protestant churches; now, in and around it, there are 105. In 1857 there were 728 Protestant pastors; now there are over 1,200."

The new Chinese minister to this country, Sir Liang Chan Tung, is a widower, with seven children. He announces that he intends to put them at school in New England and give them a good American education.

The Cheyenne Indians in Canadian County, Okla., are said to be full of wrath and the war spirit, because an Indian agent has forbidden them to wind up their great annual religious festival and sun-dance with the customary tortures. This is said to be the first time the government has interfered in the Cheyenne ceremonies.

Dr. Herzl, the promoter of the Zionist scheme for the re-occupation of Palestine by the Jews, reports that his recent conference with the Sultan was without result. The Sultan expressed sympathy with the Jews in their purpose, and named certain concessions which he would grant, but these did not meet the requirements of the Zionists.

On the borders of Tibet lives Rev. A. W. Hyde, of the Moravian Missionary Society. He has learned the Tibetan language, and has translated the whole Bible into it. Though not allowed to enter the land, he converses with travelers passing to and fro across the border. He has lived there nearly fifty years, hoping and waiting for the opportunity to preach in Tibet.

THE WETTERHORN. THE SCENE OF THE RECENT ALPINE DISASTERS

bookkeeper was a protege of the mine-owner, and had been a long time in his service. Desiring to reward him for his fidelity, he turned over to him one of his mines on a lease for a term of years. He calculated how much ore the bookkeeper would be able to get out of the mine every year, and based the amount of rental to be paid on that figure, so as to leave the bookkeeper a handsome profit on the arrangement. But the bookkeeper sold his lease to an American capitalist, who promptly put in new machinery, employed a larger force of laborers, and sank new shafts, so that, as the owner alleges, he can completely exhaust the mine before the expiration of the lease. The owner had not contemplated any enterprise of that kind, but had depended on getting back the mine at the end of the lease with only the nominal withdrawals damages for an assault. The peculiarity of the suit was that the injured man was not touched by the man whom he sued, nor was there any intent to injure him; yet the court decided that his claim for damages was valid. It appears that a tall, strong man entered the stockyards at Indianapolis and there recognized a friend, whom he greeted in demonstrative fashion, by seizing one of his shoulders and turning him suddenly around, addressing him at the same time by a jocose epithet. It happened that an invalid gentleman was at the moment leaning on the arm of the man so greeted. Suddenly deprived of his support by his friend's involuntary gyration, he fell heavily to the ground, dislocating his shoulder and receiving a severe shock. He thereupon sued the effusive acquaintance of his friend, and the court has accorded him

MONT-LAWN'S 9TH
SUMMER ENDS

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME CLOSES

REVIEW OF THE WORK

"GOOD-BYE"

MONT-LAWN has closed for the season of 1902. The meadows are deserted, the scups hang idle; and no more do hurrying little feet on butterfly chases and pleasure bent, press the velvet grasses of the wide lawn. What a lonely, lonely place it is without our children! The very birds and the squirrels seem to miss their little playmates; and the wild-flowers droop for childish hands to pluck them.

The last Sunday service in the little chapel was a praise meeting, and Dr. Klopsch presided. The season has been a blessed one. Many hundreds of children have been entertained at the Home this summer. Little ones who came to us, pale, wan, ragged and an-hungered, have been clothed and fed, and after a long, joyous outing, have gone back to their tenement homes, brown as berries, rosy and strong, and ready to take their places in the city schools. Better than all, they have returned with something more lasting than material benefits as their heritage from Mont-Lawn. Every child who has been to the Home has been taught to look to Jesus as a sure friend, and to call upon him in time of trouble; evil surroundings and unhappy circumstances will not put that beautiful lesson entirely out of the minds of any, while upon the hearts of hundreds it has taken deep and abiding hold. Even now, pretty Gospel songs learned in our chapel are echoing through many tenement homes; and there is probably not one block in the slums of this crowded city that has not felt Mont-Lawn's purifying influences.

This is the ninth season of the Home; and, perhaps, a glance backward is timely—particularly as many new friends are interested to know when and how it began. It opened first in 1894. The sufferings and perils of the children of the tenements during the heated term, when their over-crowded abodes are like furnaces, and the very air they breathe is heavy with evil odors, had been forced upon the attention of pastors, missionaries, and Sunday School teachers acting as our agents of relief, until Dr. Klopsch determined to open a summer home in the country for these unfortunates. Mont-Lawn was secured, Rev. Dr. Jewett, the owner, offering it at a nominal rental for the use of a work that he heartily approved. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fully equipped and furnished it; put trained workers in charge; and then gathered the waifs in from highways and by-ways and made them as happy as love and kindness could make them. Readers of the paper all over the land lent hearty sympathy and generous aid. They wrote letters about it, contributed to it, prayed for it, wanted it continued from year to year. In the city, preachers, teachers, missionaries, poverty-stricken mothers—and small ragged folk themselves—have appealed each season, in increasing numbers, for extension of the privileges of the Home. In 1898, when Dr. Jewett died, it looked as if we should lose Mont-Lawn, the place made sacred by so many hallowed associations; but in the following year Dr. Klopsch bought the property, and since then it has been devoted to the children. In 1899, the Home was formally incorporated, under the name of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home.

In God's providence, every emergency has been met, so that the work has never faltered. All the buildings, except the principal one, were weatherworn. As one after another became uninhabitable, we asked ourselves: "What shall we do with our little guests? Must we cut down the number?" And the answer came. Over a year ago, out of the estate of Miss Jane Hope, a benevolent lady who had remembered our waifs kindly in her lifetime, an offering was sent for the purpose of erecting a memorial at Mont-Lawn; so pretty "Hope Cottage" arose on the hillside. Last spring "Tibbals Cottage," Miss Sarah J. Tibbals' tribute to her brother, Lewis J. Tibbals, the Christian philanthropist, came to keep "Hope" company. These buildings were finished in time to house a lot of wee girls—exiles from the Annex, the old farmhouse, which had outlived its best days. A year ago we abandoned, as unsafe, the old Lodge, which had till then served as a commodious boys' dormitory, and were much put to it to stow all our lads away. Now, at the entrance, stands a new Lodge, memorial to the "devoted Christian mother," whose daughter gave it. Many little white beds in the dormitories this summer had inscriptions over them, saying: "Supported for the season" by this or that kind friend; some were memorials.

The chapel—the best-loved building on the place, the house in which our little ones hear about Jesus, where they learn their Bible texts and stories and sing their pretty Gospel songs and raise their voices to God in united prayer—is fast falling into decay. By continued repairs we keep it habitable, but it cannot be long before we must abandon it. But the needs of the little worshipers will be supplied; God will not leave them without a place to worship him in. "Thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things." He has seen how they love their chapel, how lovingly they decorate it with wild-flowers and ferns and branches of trees; and now that it must go, another will be provided. Perhaps some bereaved father and mother whom God has blessed with means, may rejoice to raise a Children's Temple of Praise in memory of a dear little one now singing in the courts of heaven.

It is indeed a time for praise! Since the Home was first opened, over 15,000 little ones have been its guests—have been clothed, fed, loved, made happy there! What a great army these would be standing all together! And what a mighty sound their childish words would make if with one voice, they could thank those who have remembered to bless them. The crippled, the blind, the deaf, the dumb, would all be in that company of little ones. And this might they truly say to God's people—friends in every State in the Union—who have helped them: "I was an-hungered and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in; naked and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me."

THE "QUINTA TRIOLET"

SMALL CUIS

MISS CUNNINGHAM'S
GOOD WORK

TRAINING CUBA'S ORPHANS

THE MATANZAS
INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL

MISS CUNNINGHAM, Principal of the Hubbard Orphanage and Industrial School in Matanzas—an institution well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—is now visiting New York in the interest of that work. She says of "Quinta Triolet" (the old Spanish name still clings to the house and grounds): "It is the only Boys' Home in Matanzas—a city of 50,000 inhabitants. There is a Roman Catholic home for girls, but none for boys. In the Government Asylum at Havana, provision is made for both sexes. After the war, the Government said: 'We will take all the children who have no one to care for them.' Now, the children had a great horror of going to the asylum—of being taken from the places and the people familiar to them. The Cubans are kind-hearted. An orphan would sob, 'I don't want to go away'; then a distant relative, or one who had been merely a neighbor of the dead parents, comes forward and says: 'I will care for the child.' The promiser's own poverty prevents fulfillment of the pledge; the child, hungry, naked, roaming the street at will, steals—and is excused. Who could blame such hopeless, homeless vagrants for pilfering to supply their necessities?"

"Santa Clara and Matanzas have more orphans than any other Cuban provinces; they bore the heaviest brunt of Weylerism. All the orphans in my home are children of reconcentrados, who were driven in from their farms at the point of the bayonet. Parents, sacrificing what little food they had to the children, died first. Clemantina, once my sewing-woman, with her husband and six children, were among these forced residents. Her husband died, and she and the six lived on rats, crabs, and such herbs as they could find, for ten days. The baby and the next oldest, died of starvation. We have the four left her. She would like to keep them; we would like to keep her; but lack of means on both sides makes either wish impossible.

"Little orphans, 'fending for themselves,' learned to lie as well as to steal. So cleverly, so pitifully they do it, ignorant of the real wickedness of it! If you find them out, they laugh at you and admire you for your cleverness. Is it not sad? To save them is our work. They are affectionate, responsive, and take to better things quickly. My treasurer is a little boy I have had for three years. I send him out to market and to make change for me—trusting him with $15 at a time—and would he hold back a cent or two? Never!

"Since Thanksgiving, when a grocer gave us a turkey, we have had no meat at any meal. We do not have butter, fresh milk, eggs or cream, nor such vegetables as we would like. But let no one pity us for that. We do not mind small privations. We have beans, rice, sweet potatoes, squash, oil and fruits—not so much of these as we need, for our house is on a rocky place, and we cannot raise anything. We have to buy, and we have very little money. But we are quite cheerful. Under my direction the children do all the work. A large part of their education lies in learning to do it well. The sweeping, the scrubbing, the dusting and putting to rights, the cooking and the laundering are all done by them. They have a great time learning to 'do up' their own small garments. They have not many of these. Our Sewing-classes make good progress. We have little girls as well as little boys, and all must do their part. I have to be in so many places at once trying to show the children how to do their work; and there is disadvantage in that. We need more instructors; need to broaden our lines and include the usual branches of manual training. We rent Quinta Triolet because it is the best we can do. We need a farm of our own, so that the boys can learn agricultural arts while supplying food for the Home. They would learn faster and become independent sooner if we were better equipped for their instruction.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have remembered our orphans very generously; and we are glad to be able to report their progress. The children are trying to improve. Some of the older ones have already gone out into the world to earn their living. Some have been restored to relatives. A few have been adopted into families able to care for them. During the school year we had thirty-three children at Quinta Triolet. The Cardenas Home is full."

It will be recalled that the Mayor of Cardenas requested Mr. Hubbard to open an orphanage there, offering a building for the purpose; and that Mr. Hubbard, obeying this call, left the Matanzas Home in charge of Miss Cunningham.

Miss Cunningham tells a touching story of two lads, now happy members of a prosperous family, into which they have been adopted. They came to the Home as brothers; but in appearance and ways there was so a great difference that one day Miss Cunningham remarked upon it to Francisco, the handsomer of the two, whose confidence had been slowly won, and he said: "It is natural, Senorita. Our parents were not the same. Oscar's mamma died when he was born. My mamma was her friend, and took him to her breast with me. He was so little and weak, Senorita! All my brothers were good to him. He is not to be told he is not my mamma's son until he is twenty-one. We agreed that was best. But I think you ought to know." "And you have never told him all the time you have played together—never wanted to tell him when you have quarreled with each other?" "Why should I, Senorita?" in surprise; "It would break his heart!"

Miss Perlee Aaronson, a young lady of Northern birth, but who has lived for the past six years in Georgia, is Miss Cunningham's representative in her absence. She is assisted by a Cuban lady, Senorita Maria Valdez. The spiritual welfare of the children is the chief care of all concerned—the first purpose of the work being to gather these little Cuban orphans into the fold of Christ.

The Fun of Clearing Up

MOST virtuously and scrupulously some women keep their houses in perfect order all the time. You cannot detect dirt with a microscope in their domains; you cannot find dust in a corner or cobweb on the ceiling, and as for their pantries and bureau drawers, order reigns there unbroken. This sort of housekeeping is certainly praise worthy, and the notable matrons who practice its rites tell you that it is just as easy as the other way, which necessitates every now and then a grand clearing up time.

I suppose they are right; and yet, these dear souls miss the fun of clearing away litter, of discovering lost and mislaid things, and of re-arrangement. It is quite impossible that they should ever feel the thrill of pride which joyously pervades the breast of the woman who has gone over her closets and shelves and boxes and bundles, who, from attic to cellar, has renovated and made spick and span a house that needed her administering touch.

For example, a half hour ago, having spent a busy morning in "putting to rights" an untidy room, I found a book that had been missing all summer. It was like suddenly meeting a friend whom I supposed to be in Africa or Polynesia. Absolutely the book seemed to smile at me, as I caressingly took it in my hands. Then, there was a stock, the disappearance of which I had mourned, and which exactly matched the warm gown which these first cool autumn days have made indispensable. And the paper-knife, the stud, the silver teaspoon, the scarf-pin, the portfolio, all of which had provokingly hidden themselves away; here they are, much more prized on their return to possession than they were in their pristine condition.

The weak point about the periodical clearing up—a point which I grant cannot be defended—is the tendency to slip back again into the chronic untidiness. The mood of complacency does not act as a spur to future carefulness. Reforms of every nature have their reactions, and, city, county, borough, or plain little home, the people who have been most energetic in setting things straight, let go their grip, and slide into the old confusion again. They have had the fun of clearing up, but they don't stay cleared up. They are, for awhile, worse than before.

Morally, too, we observe, that those who brace up, and, under some sporadic influence, renounce bad habits and walk in wisdom's ways, instead of strolling along folly's paths, are not invariably to be trusted. Here, however, the reform to last must be radical; must strike to the very depths of character, and help must come from One who is mighty. The process of moral clearing up, unlike that in things material, is attended by pains and pangs, by the inevitable discomfort of sloughing off the old and taking on the new. There isn't much fun about it; but if undertaken in Christ's name, it will endure.

The Absentee from Home

Few households have not their absentee members. The fact that this is so, adds a great deal to the interest of the daily life. Should everyone stay closely beside the old fireside, the consequence would be immediate—in narrowness and provincialism. We broaden the point of view when we send son or daughter into the bigger space beyond our doors. We learn more of the distant town or State or the far-off land, from reading the letters Ned and Johanna send home, than we possibly could by reading books of travel or descriptions in the newspaper. Somebody who belongs to us is over there, and that fact makes a really big difference.

Let us remember the absentee member of the family by praying for his safety, by thinking of him, and by regular correspondence. When steamer day comes, let the letter be ready. How much a letter from home means to one who is far away! No trivial excuse should be offered to keep us from doing our share in showing the home's loved one that absence but makes the heart grow fonder. The boy or girl at college should be held very constantly and lovingly in mind by those at home.

DON'T MAUL POOR PUSSY

A LITTLE boy named Paul
Is often seen to maul
Poor, helpless Puss.
She tries to get away,
She does her best to say,
"I loathe this fuss."

With scratch of sharp, keen claw,
Close hid in velvet paw,
She does her best.

PICKING FLOWERS

Little sisters gaily playing, where the pretty flowers grow, Flowers themselves as sweet and lovely are these darlings, don't you know.

But this same naughty boy
Finds deepest fun and joy,
And will not rest.

Until the worried cat,
Worse treated than a rat,
Has left her mark
Upon his cheek or hand,
Much like a burnt-in brand,
Long, rough, and stark.

Oh, silly lad named Paul,
Why will you sadly maul
The household pet.
Sure, she is not to blame
Her right of peace to claim,
Which you forget.

Trunks Galore

IN the first week of September, the terminals of the railroads in New York and Jersey City were a sight to remember. Ten thousand trunks at Grand Central Station alone on September 3. The bronzed and ruddy pilgrims who came flocking home were loaded with grip-sacks, suit-cases, bundles, golf-clubs, tennis-rackets, fishing-poles, and other vacation paraphernalia; and, as for the children, their feet were so light and their eyes so danced, that it did one good to look at them. Every express wagon was loaded beyond its capacity, and the carrying power of all transporting conveyances was taxed. But the merry crowds were not put out by delays in securing their luggage. Americans are always good-natured in such circumstances, and if the trunks did not come home promptly, their owners made the best of it. The season is said to have been rather dull at out-of-town resorts. What would have become of us all if it had been a good one, is the natural question when one observes the mountainous loads of baggage brought back.

So complete and convenient is our system of checks, that trunks are rarely lost or even mixed up. They come home, perhaps the worse for wear, but that is good for trade. If trunks and boxes lasted as the old hair-covered things of our forefathers did, the trunk dealers would have to go out of business.

For those ladies who have to take short trips, and wish to carry sufficient clothing for several days and changes; nothing, let me say in passing, quite compares to the light and clean Japanese affairs of straw, which, in bags and cases and telescopes, are offered at reasonable prices. They weigh so little, that their owners are, in a measure, independent of the express companies.

Servants at Prayers

A correspondent inquires, "Should the servants of a family be compelled to come in to prayers?" Certainly not. Compulsion here would be extremely despotic and an invasion of other people's rights. One has no more right to insist that an employee in the household shall attend family prayers, than that the carpenter or mason on an outdoor job shall do so. But one should give the invitation and the opportunity to every person under one's roof to unite in family worship. In England, where life is a little more patriarchal than here, the servants and the children attend family prayers. The question is interesting, as showing that there are among our readers those who maintain religious worship in the home, as we all ought to do.

Beautiful Children

A man and a woman entered a railway car together the other day. She carried bags and bundles, he bore aloft on his shoulder a little lad of fifteen or sixteen months. Neither parent was remarkable for good looks. They were just two ordinary, plain and sensible Americans. But words cannot picture the beauty of that child. His round, rosy face, all dimples and smiles, his head crowned with clustering ringlets, his air of kingship, as if born to rule, his fearless confidence in the goodness of all whom he met, fairly lit up the car, and everybody around was happier, for the sunshine of the lovely child-face made a radiance for the older people and blessed them unaware.

AUNT PRUDENCE'S EASY CHAIR

—EUGENIA. It is unwise for people of opposite and irreconcilable religious beliefs to marry.

—PRISCILLA. You have refused a good man. You can hardly call him back and say you have changed your mind. He has probably changed his.

—SUCH A PITY. Yes, indeed, to any one who cares for girls, it is sad to see them starting wrong; given to gossip, headstrong and deceitful. But if the girls can be brought to see how they look in other people's eyes, they may reform.

Angels Unawares

If Fate had cast Mrs. Beaumont's lines among the great middle class, she would have proven a consistent, sympathetic friend. Under a seemingly cold exterior would have been found good sense, great kindness, and pure devotion in religious matters. As it was, all her life she had been hedged about with rigid conventions and great wealth, and being of a passive nature, she settled readily into grooves fixed by circumstances.

While a patroness of many charity boards, and most liberal and unfailing in giving of her abundance, there was little of personal touch in her charities.

Widowed in middle life, with two lovely daughters married to substantial men, a son, a model man of influence and prosperity, and a handsome younger son just launched into the world of fashion and business—any mother might feel proud to have claimed them, one and all.

When friends spoke of the fine characters of her children, she would offer up silent thanks to the Maker of all. Her's was a placidly reverential spirit, acknowledging openly its allegiance to God by conforming rigidly to her church conventions. The depths of her nature were seldom stirred.

Once, years ago, a little one had been called to the Realm of the Blest, and she had sorrowed for it as any common mother might have mourned—money was lavished in flowers and pageant, and a costly tomb enfolded it. If its little hands sometimes beckoned to her through those of some tiny sufferer seen incidentally by the wayside, the wish would well up, as the tears dimmed her eyes, that she might do more to alleviate the suffering of the poor, and, acting upon these impulses, her gifts, for a time at least, would be prodigal.

Mrs. Beaumont had been wintering in Florida, a member of a charming party. She had always enjoyed remarkably good health, but this winter it seemed difficult for her to recover from a heavy cold taken in the early fall, and she had not strengthened as the spring approached. Also, she had been depressed by the death of a young man of their party—a witty, sparkling, fascinating unbeliever. This was the first time she had been brought face to face with the death of an adult, her husband having died of Roman fever abroad, while she was not with him.

One day, feeling oppressed in the house, contrary to her custom, she walked out alone in the little village nestled about the great hotel. A beautiful shell drive, with a path on the side, enticed her quite beyond the limits of her walks. She was enjoying the soft spring air, and delighting in the fragrance of the jessamine and the lilt of the mocking-bird, when a tremendous peal of thunder and a blinding flash seemed to part the heavens. Fearing the rain would follow, she took refuge in a cottage near by.

Reaching the door in bewilderment as the torrent descended, she was reassured by hearing a woman's voice say: "Come right in, ma'am; I am certainly glad to see you. I'm all alone, you see, and ever since I was a child I get a little nervous when it lightens like this. I'm not afraid He'll fail me, but it's human for us weakly ones to be timid. Take that chair, please, and excuse me for not rising; I'm all crippled up with the rheumatism. I've been down a long while, and am thankful to be sitting in this chair. Hetty, my daughter, fixes me up before she goes to the shop—she's a milliner, and she's done mighty well this winter."

Mrs. Beaumont recalled a shabby little shop where, one day, she had gone for some ribbon, and where a plain, poorly-dressed young woman had presided.

"Hetty is young, but she's mighty thoughtful. This is my lunch right here," pointing to a table near her covered with a coarse towel, "and I just heat my tea over this little lamp. I judge you're staying at the hotel? Maybe you've been into Hetty's shop? It's not much of a place to such as you, I reckon, but it's a great deal to us."

Mrs. Beaumont's face expressed polite interest.

"You see, I'm a lone widow," continued the invalid, "and when my husband was killed in one of the last battles of the war, he left me with six little children, a poor farm, and some cows. Yes, ma'am I've hoed my row many a day, and the children all worked from the time they could walk good. It looked very dark sometimes, specially when sickness would come. One day a limb of a tree fell on me, and I was abed nigh three months; but the children managed somehow, and we always had bread to eat—thank the Lord! You know, ma'am, He promised 'Thy seed shall not beg bread.' I'm afraid I'm tiring you with all this. The likes of you don't know much about all such troubles, I reckon."

"Oh, go on," said Mrs. Beaumont, earnestly. "You are interesting me. Where are the children now?"

"Well, ma'am, this was thirty-four years ago that he left me. Hetty was a month old; John, the oldest, he married, and his wife had a little farm, and he is an elder and a Sunday School Superintendent, praise God, and has several little ones. Janey is married, too, and has four little ones, and her husband is a good Christian man, and they farm, too; and," a sadder look clouding for a moment her cheerful, pain-scarred face, "Tom and Matt died when they were small, almost the same day, of some kind of disease. I hear their graves are all plowed over, but I don't trouble about that; you know the good Book says, 'Their angels see the face of God.' Yes, ma'am, they are all believers, all safe since they were young—all but Ichabod! You'd wonder that he wouldn't be, after seeing all that God has done for us."

Mrs. Beaumont's critical eyes had taken in the dreary absence of every comfort. The room had only the simplest necessities—the rickety old rocker in which the woman rested; the pine table; the coarse, clean cloth on which her scant luncheon rested; two chairs; and then a thrill of wonder ran through the visitor as her thoughts flew to the sumptuous home which owned her mistress. The earnest tones of the speaker recalled her attention.

"Yes, ma'am, I prayed and prayed for our Ichy, but there was no awakening. You mustn't think, ma'am, that he was a downright wicked boy. He was always a dutiful son, but he had not been regenerated—the Spirit had not touched him. He'd say, 'Ma, I don't break any of the big commandments,' and I'd have to say, 'Ichy, remember the young man who had kept them all from his youth up, and Jesus sent him away sorrowful'—and he'd say, 'I ain't got no money, ma. What must I give up?' And, ma'am, it did seem, while we was so much better off than some folks, that we hadn't much we could give up. So I'd say, 'wrestle with the tempter, son, wrestle.' Ichy is a dentist, that is, he's just starting out. It took all the money we could scrape to send him, but he's making his way now."

"Can I tell you, ma'am, about Ichy's conversion? Well, we were all staying a while at Jenny's—she's fixed pretty comfortable and is a good Christian. There was a revival going on in the church there, and we enjoyed it day and night. Time? Oh, yes, ma'am, you can always find plenty of time to go to meetings if you manage it rightly. Nearly everybody got impressed but Ichy and some young fellows. He'd go up to be prayed for every night, and after we'd go home, he'd say, 'Ma, it ain't no use.' Well, I was well-nigh distracted; but I never lost hope, and I continued in prayer. The last night came, and he wouldn't go up when the call was made. I saw him leave the

Are churches justified in requiring evidence of conversion before admitting persons to the communion of the Lord's Supper?

Churches Should Demand Evidence

Churches are not only justified in requiring evidence of conversion from those desiring to partake of the Lord's Supper, but are under obligation to do so. The Lord's Supper was instituted as a memorial of an accomplished work, and only those in whom this work has taken place can properly eat of it. It is not a means of salvation, nor a help to salvation, but a feast celebrated by those who already enjoy salvation. It may certainly be very justly objected that the church has no means of finding out whether a person is truly saved or not; we must believe those who profess salvation, if they show no unmistakable evidences of gross wickedness in their lives.

WILBUR L. CASWELL.

The Ordinance Requires It

The significance of the observance would seem to require it. The churches are visible representatives of the body of Christ. "Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular" (I Cor. 12: 27). At the communion the church is assembled, as a testimony of loyalty and loving remembrance. The Lord's Supper is the appointed witness and memorial of the central fact of the Christian system. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" I Cor. 10: 16. As baptism is the individual confession of discipleship, communion is the recognition of the disciples of the Christ. One must have entered the household of faith to be entitled to the privileges of those within. One should give evidence of "walking in newness of life," in order "legitimately" to "show forth his death." "As often as ye (my disciples) eat this bread and drink this cup ye do show forth the Lord's death till he come" (I Cor. 11: 26).

H. R. TRAVER.

Man Cannot be the Judge

God alone knows what is in man. And a man may give verbal evidence of conversion whose life does in no wise agree with his words. Who of all the human family is so perfect in every detail of his daily life, that he dare arrogate to himself the right to say what this or that man shall or shall not do? Should we not rather accord to others the leniency that we require for ourselves, on the ground that we are all alike faulty? We dare not judge him unworthy whom God in his infinite mercy and patience receives.

MARY DREW.

The Question Must Rest With God

It is not for man to decide, by his certain modes and forms, who shall be assured of His saving grace. Conversion must prove itself by sincerity. Now answering the question: they are not, in the sense of requiring evidence. If so, in what way, or by what method of procedure would the church analyze the individual motive of sincerity? Christ knew the purpose of one of his disciples to betray him, before they sat down to the Last Supper, yet he required no evidence from Judas that he was sincere—that was left to the conscience of the betrayer. Yet Christ was immaculate, but did not require this evidence before he should sit down at the table. How then will the church, not immaculate, require evidence of conversion, when the truth of the fact lies wholly within the breast of the individual?

Christianity is not limited to one doctrine, but many, and each has its converts. What would seem conversion to one might be doubted by another. The question of conversion, therefore, must be left with the individual, and he be left to his conscience and his God.

OLIVER M. WILSON.

Christ Invites All to Come

No! Christ never did anything to turn people away from him or from his church. His whole life was vocal with invitations to come. He still invites the whole world to fellowship. He will tell by the Holy Spirit those who partake of the consecrated elements whether they eat and drink damnation to their souls by hypocrisy. It is the duty of clergymen to teach true doctrines, to portray the winsomeness of Christ and the true significance of his sacrificial death. If the spirit of the holy communion is sacred, the people outside the fold will be slow to intrude, and if they do venture in, the Holy Ghost may convert them and inspire faith. The Christian must not assume the role of judge; that is the Master's prerogative.

CLAUDE M. SEVERANCE.

Susanna Wesley's Conversion

Susanna Wesley received the assurance of sins forgiven at the communion table. It does not seem that churches could be justified in requiring evidence of conversion before admitting persons to the communion of the Lord's Supper. The right attitude is that taken by some church disciplines. "Ye that do truly and earnestly repent of your sins, are in love and charity with your neighbors, and intend to lead a new life, following the commandments of God, and walking henceforth in his holy ways, draw near with faith, and take this holy sacrament to your comfort, and make your humble confession to Almighty God, meekly kneeling upon your knees."

KATE H. BOOTH.

Each Must Examine Himself

The Apostolic injunction is for each to examine himself, and to find out whether he is worthy or not. This should settle the whole question, for if any choose to eat and drink to their own condemnation, it does not detract from the spiritual blessings the others hope to receive, nor does it mar the sanctity of the place and ceremony. On the other hand, when a Christian organization makes itself an inquisitorial court, to examine and regulate the consciences of men, it is getting into an attitude of intolerance that soon destroys its Christian character.

sistently enter the visible kingdom below. It is a mistaken kindness that leads ministers sometimes to invite to the Lord's table all "who love Jesus," leaving each one to be judge of his own fitness, and opening the way, it is to be feared, for the shallow, the impulsive, the untaught. Only to those baptized on profession of faith, or renewing at the altar the vows of baptism in infancy, should be given the hallowed symbols of the communion.

None Entitled but Real Christians

I do not believe that any are entitled to such sacred rights except those of a contrite heart, and who confess Christ before men. While to some, this might look like closing the doors against our fellow man, yet, if they would seek to enter the sacred precincts, let them knock and the doors will be opened; let them ask and they will receive. But they should not try to enter in "as a thief." Christ says "he that entereth not by the doors into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."

J. F. Gladstone, N. J. What would probably be the result if our government would send, by mail, Christian literature, illustrated, in English and Filipino, to that people, comparing the cost and result with war?

The result would, no doubt, be eminently satisfactory, from a missionary standpoint, but our government is not at all likely to undertake the work. It is, however, educating the natives, and as it is driving out the friars, the

INDIA BLESSED WITH RAIN

FROM time to time, during the last few months, there have been ominous forebodings of a renewal of famine conditions in India. Long rainless weeks had passed, and the period of the fall rains was slipping away, yet not a drop of moisture fell to refresh the scorched ground. Hope died out, and even the faithful missionaries began to fear that the famine would soon have the land again in its grasp. But there were many among God's people who had continued, during those trying weeks, in constant prayer.

How grandly their faith was justified is shown in the following letter, received from a missionary correspondent at Medak (in the Nizam's Dominion):

We have just had a wonderful answer to prayer. For six weeks the rain has held off, and half the season is gone. We had been casually praying for rain, but I was greatly moved last Saturday night to make it the subject of a great appeal. We prayed for many hours that night, and on Sunday morning we had three hundred villagers, and we still continued in prayer, and taught them to join us. The horrible hurricane winds, which for six weeks have been blowing the rain-filled clouds over our heads and leaving us never a drop, showed no signs of ceasing.

As we closed the morning service, I challenged them all to private prayer, for as yet we had no answer to our petitions. Ere we had finished lunch, the villagers came rushing into our veranda, and behold, after six weeks of drought, there was a most beautiful, soft, steady rain, that was sinking, every drop of it, into the soil—not at all the sudden, tropical rainstorm that accompanies these winds, but a far better and enduring one—so that we could read in its very unusual but most desirable form that it was in very deed God's answer to our prayers.

On Tuesday morning we had another hour of prayer, instead of our usual Bible lesson. As we went in, the driving winds were again blowing every drop of rain away. Yet, ere the precious hour was gone, the clouds were dropping their priceless treasure steadily and beautifully down upon the parched fields, and now for thirty-six hours it has hardly stopped!

spiritual field is open to the Christian Churches to occupy and cultivate.

D. P. Clemence, Providence, R. I. What is the present population of Jerusalem?

Pierotti gives it at 20,330: viz., Christians, 5,068; Moslems, 7,556; Jews, 7,706. In 1891, its population was about 28,000. In the last ten years there has been considerable addition, and it is now probably 35,000.

J. K., Lagrange, N. C. Should a Sunday School teacher be treated with greater consideration (as she gives her services) than the scholars, or should all be treated alike, in view of the fact that we are all one flesh and blood, and all stand on an equal footing?

Certainly, greater consideration is due to the teacher than to the pupils, although, in the ordinary sense of doing justice, all should be held as equal. Courtesy will suggest distinctions, however, and the same degree of deference that is extended to a senior would be out of place in dealing with children.

Inquirer, Phila., Pa. Who is the Judge Benjamin, recently referred to as having given an opinion on the coal strike, and what was his position on the question?

He is Judge R. M. Benjamin, of Bloomington, Ill., a leading western jurist and authoritative writer. He holds that the Governor of Pennsylvania has the power to notify the coal operators that, unless the mines are working by a certain date, he will call a special session of the legislature, which, in its turn, can classify the mines, regulate prices for labor, and thus bring about resumption.

E. W. G., Richfield, Pa. Does "Paradise" signify Heaven, the Eternal City of God, or is it an intermediate place of rest for the saints until judgment?

The word is derived from the Sanscrit paradesa, Persian pardes, Hebrew pardes, and Arabic firdaus, all meaning, substantially the same, that is "a park." It does not occur in the Old Testament (English version) but is used in the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew word gan (a garden, see Genesis 2: 8), and thus it came to be used in the New Testament to figuratively represent the heavenly abode of the righteous. Among Bible commentators it has come to be used interchangeably as referring to the Paradise of Eden, or the dwelling-place of the righteous.

It seems to me that it would be a good deal harder to believe that this was mere chance than to believe, as I most assuredly do, that God delighted to answer his children's prayers, and gave, as he always gives, more than all we had ever dreamed of.

It has caused quite a sensation among every one here. The students believe and are filled with joy. It has taught all of us a great lesson, and it was with very full hearts and amid great rejoicings that we had a thanksgiving meeting this morning.

A CAT'S INTELLIGENCE.

Dumb Animals Can Scent Danger.

A cat will refuse to drink coffee, but will drink and thrive on Postum Food Coffee. Mrs. Alice Gould, of Maywood, Ill., says, "Coffee drinking made me very much run down, thin and nervous, and I thought I should have to give up my work."

I was induced to try Postum by a friend who suffered four years from severe sick headaches lasting for several days at a time, who said that since using Postum Coffee she had been entirely free from an attack. I found that by making Postum according to directions it was equal to coffee in flavor.

It is now six months since I began drinking Postum and I have gained 18 pounds in weight. It has built me up and I feel like a new person.

We all drink it now, even to the cat, who is the pet of the family and it is funny to see him drink his bowl of Postum Food Coffee every morning. We often try to get him to drink coffee, but he has the good sense to refuse it."

FAITH AND WORKS

God's Promise to Joshua Dependent on His Conduct

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

WHAT a type is Joshua of the child of God under law and under grace! While we are under the law, knowing what is right, but powerless to do it, for the law is weak through the flesh, and in us of ourselves lies no power to fulfil it—power over sin lies still in the future; it exists only as a promise. But when Christ, our Joshua, takes possession of us, and we see ourselves through the law "dead to the law by the body of Christ," our sin and our sinful nature in him already nailed to the cross, and he in his holy, powerful nature living in us—then the will of God becomes possible; he in us can do the will of God. God repeated to Joshua what he had said previously to Moses (Deut. 40: 24, 25): "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, to you have I given it, as I spake unto Moses." Here is the essence of faith. All which God has promised needs personal appropriation; the foot must tread upon the very spot, our whole weight must rest upon it; God says: "I have given;" we say, "I take it now." The whole land was given to the people, but every foot of land had to be conquered, and the enemies driven out in order that it might be enjoyed. But the promise of God gave certain victory over these enemies: "There shall not any man—even the sons of Anak—be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." God takes the responsibility of his gifts as well as of his commandments. If God be for us who can be against us? As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." Moses was continually calling upon the Lord, and never in vain; Joshua must not presume on the promise, but must seek the Lord as Moses did on every occasion, and he would find that Moses' God was his God.

"I will not fail thee nor forsake thee." This was God's pledge, but it required an answering attitude on the part of his servant. It is as though God had said, "I am to be counted on; can I count on thee? Be strong, and of a good courage." Perhaps no man in Israel felt so weak as Joshua did at this moment. Moses, the man of God, to whom he had ministered, with whom he had stood, whose burden for the people, and whose prayers he had shared, was dead, there was no one to be to Joshua what Moses had been; and the burden of the people, humanly speaking, fell on him alone. But here was just the point. Could he trust God to be to him what he had been to Moses? If so, he would be strong, not in himself, but in the fact that the Almighty God was his Strength, and that nothing was impossible with him. "Faith is the prerogative of the weak," a man of God has said. It is just when we see our own powerlessness that we can lie back on the might and on the faithfulness of our God. Self-reliance often fails under a test.

"Be strong, and of a good courage, for thou shalt cause this people to inherit the land. God repeats to Joshua here what he had put in Moses' mouth for him (Deut. 31: 7, 8). How precious to have it thus repeated direct from God! Nothing which comes through men has such power over our lives as those communications which come to us through the Word of God brought home with power by his Spirit. But how was the strength and courage to come to Joshua? Just as it is with us, by the written Word of God. "Only be strong and very courageous to observe to do according to all the law, which Moses commanded thee, turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest have good success." Blessed are they whose chief conversation is in the Word of the Lord; they are indeed like "a well of living water."

church before the services were over, and my heart was wellnigh to breaking. When I went to bed, I hadn't seen him since church. Jenny's husband's people had come to stay with her during the meeting, and we were a little crowded for sleeping, so Ichy had a cot in my room. I waited for him to come, but he didn't. I got down on my knees—thank God I could kneel then!—and I prayed fervently. I'm afraid I reproached the Lord, but he forgave me if I did. Ichy came in, and I called to him and made him kneel beside me, and soon he joined me in prayer, but there was no answer, although we wrestled for nigh on to an hour. At last I went to bed, and as I lay in bed I kept on praying, and I seemed to feel an answer. I called quick, 'Ichy, Ichy, the Lord is here.' He answered, 'He is, ma, I feel his presence,' and then I could see that he had been standing at the window. He came toward me, and I tell you, ma'am, we felt just like shouting for joy. Jenny came in with her good husband and his folks, and the glory of God compassed us round about. There was no more sleeping for us that night."

A light beautiful to behold shone over the countenance of this poor, bedridden, rejoicing mother, while the tears of emotion streamed down Mrs. Beaumont's face.

The mother continued, after some moments of silence, "We are told that, if we do His will, we shall be 'blessed in barn and in store,' and it has been so with us, for Hetty has a right good business and Ichy is getting a reputation for dentistry, and between them they are able to take care of me and give me all these comforts," looking complacently around the room. "Yes, ma'am, it certainly pays to serve the Lord, even in this life. But laws, ma'am, I know you must be tired of that straight chair. I wish I wasn't so crippled that I can't offer you this one. I'm certainly glad to have your company. Would you mind, ma'am, if I take my lunch now? It's past my time, and we take breakfast so early. See how fortunate I've been. Some customer from the hotel brought Hetty this little stove, as she was leaving, and it comes so handy to heat my tea on right here, without getting up."

While talking, she was uncovering her tray, and lighting the lamp, and placing the brown teapot over the flame. Mrs. Beaumont sat helpless—she had never lighted a lamp in her life.

"Maybe you feel hungry, and will join me—that is, after I've asked a blessing." With reverence she thanked God for the food so graciously provided—some bread and three potatoes.

Mrs. Beaumont drew her chair up to the table, and accepted the bread and tea (she had taken a cup from the shelf), and the two women ate in silence. Mrs. Leggett with thankful relish, and Mrs. Beaumont, as if it had been "His table."

The rain stopped, the sun burst out in glory, and Mrs. Beaumont rose to leave. There was a soft frou frou of silk as she moved towards her hostess, who exclaimed: "I've certainly enjoyed your visit, ma'm. I'd been mighty lonely here in the storm by myself. It's been like entertaining angels unawares."

Mrs. Beaumont took the old face between her hands, and kissed the brow, as, with emotion she said:

"This has been the sweetest visit I ever made. The Lord must have guided me in. I feel as if I had been entertained by angels."

Shall we follow her as she made her way to the little shop, and bought almost the entire stock of ribbons; thence to the hotel, where she remembered that an invalid was leaving who possessed an excellent wheel chair, which she purchased for her friend? And ever there came to her a passage which had lodged in memory, without visible impression before. "I have been young, and now I am old, yet I have not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

IN CHINESE THE REGINA

is sometimes called Tzu-Shen-Tan-Chin, or the "Organ that Plays-From-Its-Own-Heart." This is a very fitting name. Just as appropriately it might be called "The Instrument that Plays to the Heart." Many persons who, by sickness or pressing cares, are deprived of other opportunities for hearing good music, have found that the REGINA plays from the heart to the heart. Its melody brings pleasure to the whole family. It teaches the children to love and know good music, while it amuses them. There is never a dull hour in the home of which the REGINA is a part. It takes the place of a piano where there is none, or when there is no one to play. It plays thousands of tunes. It is ever ready, always in the mood.

The REGINA is fully guaranteed and is for sale by leading dealers everywhere. Any REGINA sent on approval to responsible parties. We pay freight where we have no dealers. SOUR BREAD.

Annoyed the Doctor.

If you get right down to the bottom of your stomach trouble it is wrong food, and the way to correct it is not by drugs but by using the right food.

A physician in Barron, Wis. writes an instructive letter on this point. He says, "I am a practicing physician, 45 years old, and about 6 feet in height. When I began using Grape-Nuts last Spring I weighed 140 lbs., was thin and poor, had a coating on my tongue and frequently belched wind or gas and small pieces of undigested bread or potatoes which were very sour, in short I had acid dyspepsia.

I consulted a brother physician who advised me to eat about four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts at the commencement of each meal and drink Postum Cereal Coffee. I had been in the habit of drinking coffee for breakfast and tea for dinner and supper. I followed the advice of my brother physician as to diet and experienced relief at once.

Ever since that time I have eaten Grape-Nuts with sweet milk or cream each morning for breakfast and I now weigh 155 lbs., and am no more troubled with sour stomach. I am very fond of Postum Food Coffee and attribute my relief as much to that as I do to Grape-Nuts.

Often when I am called out in the night to see a patient and on my return home I feel tired and hungry, I eat the usual quantity of Grape-Nuts before going to bed and then sleep soundly all night." Name given by Postum Co, Battle Creek, Mich.

A SEARCHING QUESTION*

The Strongest and Most Effective Force in the Transformation of Character . . .

HOW much was comprised in that question which Christ put to Peter in that final interview!

He did not ask, as on a previous occasion, for an expression of his faith, or for a pledge of future fidelity, which would have been appropriate, considering his recent denial, but simply for an avowal of his love. If Peter really loved him what might not be expected of him? What will a man not do when he really loves? The story is told of a physician, that once when he was very busy, he heard that a little boy of whom he was fond, was lying ill in a town twenty-five miles off, where the child was spending his vacation. That night, after the physician had seen all his patients, he drove over to the country town to see his little friend, consulted with the physician attending him and prescribed for him, getting back to town in time to begin his round of visits the next morning. When in the course of a few months the father of the child received his annual bill from the physician, he noticed that there was no charge for that long night journey, and he called the physician's attention to the oversight. "What," exclaimed the doctor, "Charge? You do not suppose I did that for money, do you?"

How many men there are in stores and offices all over the land toiling early and late, who are perfectly content to keep on working for the sake of their families! The money their labor brings to themselves, personally, is a miserable compensation; indeed they could not be hired at any price to do so much work, but they do it voluntarily, gladly, in order that their wives and children may enjoy the proceeds. A potent force is love, which once entering the human heart becomes a motive and controlling influence that has no equal. It is a transforming power, too, affecting character. There is no other power known to us that will do that. Therefore when Christ said to Peter, "Lovest thou me?" he put his finger with unerring penetration on the very springs of his character. If Peter really loved him, courage would be easy, labor would be a pleasure, fidelity would never waver. All that Christ needed from his servant would be assured, if there was genuine love for him in Peter's heart. And besides all that, Peter himself would become Christlike, for by a law of our nature a man becomes like that which he loves.

The conditions of membership in Christ's kingdom have not changed. The supreme test is still the one which Christ applied to Peter. Men may differ in knowledge, in creed, in doctrine, in mode of worship, but if they love Christ with sincere, heartfelt devotion, they are Christians and brothers one of another. A higher ideal of a transformed world could not be conceived than that of a world in which every man and woman was governed by this one controlling force. If every one loved Christ, and obeyed him with that loyalty that love produces, there would be an end of crime, of war, of oppression, of poverty, and of evil of every kind, because he who loves Christ will love his brother also. How far we fall short of this ideal may be seen by the present condition of society. Even the church does not live up to it, otherwise the world would have been drawn into its borders, long ere this. If men of the world had witnessed a church held together by love to Christ, its members loyal to him and to one another, the spectacle would have been so attractive that it would have been irresistible. It is here that reformation will sooner or later have to begin. When men ask themselves in all sincerity, Do I love Christ? and realize what that love involves, with a resolute determination to act upon the answer, then we shall see a changed world. The selfishness which now governs all forms of life will disappear, and that beautiful life which compels the admiration even of the godless, will become the model after which all strive, and so Christ's prediction will be fulfilled, "If I be lifted up will draw all men unto me."

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones In

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not invest in it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers use White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $100 to $4,000, with price at once for free designs and information. It puts in under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Also $75.00 worth of work sold to Christian Herald readers in the last few years.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Mr. Creelman's Latest Work

JAMES CREELMAN'S new book, Eagle Blood, is a story to stir Americans. Those who know Mr. Creelman's career, and have read his On the Great Highway, do not need to be told that he is a master in the description of battle scenes, and the delineation of types of all nations. In Eagle Blood he gives a picture of a charming American girl, whose influence on the character and fortunes of a young English nobleman, forms the central theme of the novel. His work deals with the present day, and there are glimpses of the drawing-rooms and streets of New York, of Westminster Abbey, London lodgings, and Philippine battlefields. The plot is an original and fascinating one, and a great patriotic lesson to American men and women slowly emerges into view. The leading character, Hugh Dorsay, is a new figure in story-telling, and Helen Martin is the spirit of Bunker Hill re-incarnated in the surroundings of to-day. It is refreshing to find an American girl in modern literature who realizes what America has done for women. The story is lit with flashes of humor and satire. It is a strong book, written in Mr. Creelman's condensed and vigorously fresh style, without a superfluous word or a dull line. Lothrop Publishing Company, Boston. Six illustrations by Rose Cecil O'Neil. Price $1.50.

Church Music

"MUSIC in the History of the Western Church," by Edward Dickinson, Professor in Oberlin (O.) College. "This volume (says the author) is an attempt to show how this problem has been treated by different confessions and in different nations and times; how music, in issuing from the bosom of the Church, has been moulded under the influence of varying ideals of devotion, liturgical usages, national temperaments, and types and methods of expression current in secular art. The author's chief purpose has been to arouse in the minds of ministers and non-professional lovers of music, as well as of church musicians, an interest in this branch of art such as they cannot feel so long as its history is unknown to them." The author has written lucidly on Primitive and Ancient Religious Music; Ritual and Song in the Early Church; The Catholic Ritual Chant; Medieval Chorus Music; The Modern Musical Mass; The Rise of the Lutheran Hymnody; The Musical System of the Church of England; In England and America; Problems of Church Music in America; and other subjects. The book is beautifully printed, on excellent paper, and well bound, with an exhaustive index. 426 pages. Price $2.50, net. Charles Scribner's Sons, Pub'rs, 153-157 Fifth Ave., New York.

CORNISH

AMERICAN PIANO FOR $15500 AND UP

YEARS TRIAL FREE

You advance no money. We prepay the freight. You shoulder no risk. We guarantee satisfaction.

When you buy a CORNISH on the CORNISH PLAN you receive a piano—exquisite in tone, beautiful in finish, perfect in action—at factory price without dealers' profits added, and you buy it with the clear proviso that if you are not satisfied after 12 months' trial we will take it back. If, after the year's trial, you are not satisfied and send the piano back to us, we will refund to you the cost and the freight charges with interest at six per cent. If you purchase, we will do anything in reason in the matter of terms. We make and sell the Cornish Pianos on honor and we have made a happy friend of every one of our 250,000 customers. Our profits are small, and we depend wholly upon the enormous output of our factory to make it pay us. To support our agreement and to make it absolutely binding upon us, we give you when you purchase a piano what is practically a bond on the whole of our million dollar plant, and this not only guarantees our promise but also warrants the piano for 25 years. All you need to do is to drop us a postal card request and we will send you our new souvenir catalogue, with all details and particulars about the instrument and our great offer. With the catalogue we will send a set of embossed miniature pianos and organs, also free, exactly like our goods, in colorings and designs, to aid you in making selection of just the instrument you want in your home.

Whether you want a high-priced or a low-priced piano, write to us and let us tell you all about what we have and how you can have a beautiful instrument on free trial for one year. If you wish to do a little work for us, we will tell you how you can get your piano without cost and how you can get a cash bonus for the first sale in a new community. Write at once. Answered in Issue of Sept. 27

Are churches justified in requiring evidence of conversion before admitting persons to the communion of the Lord's Supper?

To be Answered in Issue of Oct. 8

Which is, under ordinary circumstances, the wiser course for a young married couple—to buy their own home, even if it should involve years of stringent economy, or to rent?

To be Answered in Issue of Oct. 15

Are stores in large cities in which a large number of trades are combined, conducive to the public prosperity, or do they increase the number of wage-earners by reducing the number of traders, eventually eliminating the middle class?

To be Answered in Issue of Oct. 22

What are the ten leading American inventions, and why are they so considered?

To be Answered in Issue of Oct. 29

What is the great public lesson to be learned from the Pennsylvania coal strike?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 12

How can I have the absolute inward assurance that my sins are forgiven? How is the assurance of forgiveness communicated to the individual soul?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 19

Is a cook, butler, manager, or other employee, who is fairly paid for his services, justified in accepting gifts from tradesmen with whom he deals, though these may not be given as "commissions"?

To be Answered in Issue of Nov. 26

In a case where the father and mother belong to different religious denominations, which of the two shall decide the denomination of the children?

Miscellaneous Questions

F. McC., Congerville, Ill. How many Indians were there in the territory of the United States when Columbus discovered this country, and how many are there now?

There is no basis for an estimate of the native population when Columbus landed in America. The Indian population at the time of the census of 1890 was under 250,000, exclusive of Alaska. The census of 1900 gave it as 145,282, exclusive of Indian Territory.

S. M., Washington, D. C. Can a person be a Christian who believes in Christ as our only Saviour and strives earnestly and prayerfully to live as a Christian should, and yet receives no assurance? The Bible says, Ask and you shall receive. It seems easy, but not for all.

Yes, we believe such an one may be a Christian, notwithstanding all drawbacks and discouragements. There are degrees in spiritual experience, just as there are in everything else, and probably no two experiences are precisely alike. To some it is a hard task, apparently, to grasp as absolute any spiritual truth; while others, with the simple faith of children, present all their needs—both for pardon and blessing—in Christ's name as he commanded, and resting on his word, receive the assurance. See John 15: 7, and also verse 16, same chapter and parallel passages. Here is no equivocal language but the plain statement that one who believes in Christ, who has surrendered all to him and is earnestly striving to follow him, has the splendid Christian privilege of asking, "in His name," for the supply of all needs.

Edith G. B., Quincy, Ill. What is the right course for a passenger to pursue in case the conductor on a street car neglects to take his fare?

There is only one course for an honest passenger. He should hand up his fare to the conductor. Such a thing may be witnessed daily in the public conveyances of any large city.

Miss R. N. S., Knoxville, Tenn. Would it not be beneficial to all Christians, and to non-churchgoers, if Protestant churches kept their doors open during the week, that all might enter for meditation or prayer, or a moment's rest, at all times?

There is much to be said in favor of this custom, which is observed by many of the ritualistic churches. There is, unquestionably, an association of sanctity connected with the building (though not in the mere edifice itself), which is helpful. In cities, where men or women are driven and pressed by business ments. The loss in wages was $257,800,000, and the employers lost $122,730,000. The general average was 1,100 strikes a year, and $19,000,000 loss annually. These figures do not include the losses sustained by businesses indirectly affected, or by the general public, neither of which can be estimated.

Rev. Alex. Parker, of Orange, Cal., writes concerning a recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which stated that this year the numerous accessions to the Presbyterian Church had "effectually turned the tide and reversed the record of preceding years, which have shown a decline in the general membership." Mr. Parker adds:

If you consult the minutes of the General Assembly for this year, you will see that the additions on confession of faith have been 65,880, instead of 12,000 to 15,000. Looking over the records since 1896, you will see that the total membership has been steadily increasing, as follows: 1896, 943,716; 1897, 960,911; 1898, 975,877; 1899, 983,927; 1900, 1,007,689; 1901, 1,025,388; 1902, 1,045,838. Thus you see there has been an increase each year. The year 1902 shows the largest increase for a number of years.

M. G. G., Big Hickory, Ark. Is it wrong for a Christian to have instruments of music in his home?

On the contrary. The more music he has, and of the right kind, the better. Music is an the expression is: "Care killed the cat," and that the author is not given. I find it credited to George Wither (1588-1667) in these two lines:

Hang sorrow! Care will kill a cat,
And therefore let's be merry.

—Poem on Christmas.

Interested Reader, Elizabeth, N. J. What was done in the case of the impious wretches in Fort Worth, Tex., who threatened to caricature the Crucifixion?

Public feeling was stirred up to such an extent that the blasphemous scheme had to be abandoned. The representative people of the community denounced it so unsparsingly as sacrilegious and outrageous, that its promoters were compelled to yield. Even the proprietors of the stockyards refused to allow it to take place on their grounds.

Mrs. S. J. M., Avonelle, Miss. Who was Mahershal-al-hash-baz, what manner of man was he and what was his office?

The name (which means "speeding for booty, he hastes to the spoil,") was written in obedience to command, by the prophet Isaiah, in large letters upon a tablet, and was afterwards given as a symbolical name to a son that was to be born to him thereafter, and as a forecast of the sudden attack by the Assyrian army. The child is thought to have been the prophet's son by the wife whom he espoused in obedience to the divine mandate.

Reader. What is the best way to protect a house from being struck by lightning?

We have submitted the foregoing question (received from a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) to The Scientific American of New York, and this answer is at hand:

A lightning-rod need be nothing more than an iron rod one-half to three-quarters of an inch thick, or a gas or water pipe slightly larger, connected firmly end to end with water-tight joints. The upper part should traverse the edges and peaks of the roof, and the lower parts should go to the ground at all the corners of the building, for best protection. The most important feature of a lightning-rod is the portion under ground. This must terminate in wet earth, and have a large ground plate to which it is screwed tight. A well furnishes this ideally. If wet earth cannot be found, some drive an iron pipe, two inches or more in diameter, twenty feet into the ground, and connect the rod and the leaders for rain-water to the top of this pipe; then, as the rain usually preceded the lightning strokes, the water from the leaders fill the pipes and furnish the needed moisture for the dissipation of the charge of electricity. All iron parts of the roof and top of the building should be joined to the rod, and no insulators should be used on the rod. Points may be put on the rod above the roof. The village blacksmith can do all this better than any "lightning-rod sharp."

D. H. Porteus, Waddington, N.Y. Has our Lord been seen since his Ascension by any one?

The Scriptures mention two instances: those of Stephen and Paul. In the former case, Stephen said (Acts 7: 56) that he saw him, "standing on the right hand of God." The case of Paul is not described so minutely. If it occurred at his conversion, as is probable, it is not stated, but only the voice is referred to. He says, however (I. Cor. 15: 8), "and last of all he was seen of me also." He refers to it also as an evidence of his apostleship (I. Cor. 9: 1), "Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" Then there are the numerous statements of John in the Revelation of his having seen Christ. In Rev. 1: 13, he speaks of him as "One like unto the Son of Man," but the character of his utterances show that he was not only like, but actually was the Son of Man.

Mrs. Susan M., Mifflintown, Pa. The passage is not in the Bible.

Subscriber, Schenectady, N.Y. You might write to the President of the Miners' Union, at Hazleton, Pa.

L. D. S., Maxwell, Ont. You will find the hymn, "Saved By Grace" (written by Fanny Crosby), in most of the popular collections.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. Machinery, by multiplying productive power a thousandfold, has greatly increased the number of workers.

Mrs. A. S. Steele, of the Steele Home for Needy Children, at Chattanooga, Tenn., writes that she has now 141 needy charges to provide and care for.

Miss M. S., Kyle, Tex. In all likelihood the "unfriendliness" to which you refer is due to reticence or lack of social culture, rather than to any feeling of animosity.

R., Philadelphia, writes: "In reading your excellent paper, you said the only way to settle the difficulty in the coal regions was arbitration, and my soul shouted for joy. That is just it, and the umpire we want is the mighty God! Let THE CHRISTIAN HERALD send up thousands of voices that this great trouble may be adjusted. 'Behold I am the Lord, the God of all flesh: is there anything too hard for me?' (Jer. 32: 27.)"

A CHURCH DEDICATION IN INDIA

Letters recently received from Gujarat, India, give interesting accounts of the dedication of a long-needed building for the use of the Methodist Mission at Nadiad. This mission, which is under the management of Rev. G. W. Park, is in the district desolated by the famine of 1900. Dr. Klopsch visited it during his stay in India and witnessed the beneficent work being carried on there. For a long time past the missionaries have labored under difficulties, owing to the lack of suitable buildings for school and worship. The new edifice combines accommodation for both purposes. It is in the form of a cross, the centre of which forms an excellent room for church service, or school assembly, while the transepts and a series of rooms abutting on the main building, serve as class-rooms for the children. It will interest readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to know that two hundred and thirty-one of the children there are supported by readers of this journal. At the dedication service, fully two thousand natives crowded into the building and listened to Bishop Warne's sermon, which was interpreted to them by Rev. Robert Ward, of Godhra. After the service, the rite of baptism was administered to four hundred and thirty persons, who have been under instruction for several months and had passed a thorough examination very satisfactorily. It is estimated that there are now 17,000 Christians in the province of Gujarat, nearly one-half of whom have been brought into the fold since the great famine.

and other cares, many often realize the need of a place where they may go, even on week days, for a moment of prayer and meditation, and this would be afforded by keeping the churches open as suggested. There are dangerous crises, in which one unconsciously seeks to be alone with God, and the open door of a convenient church at such a moment, might be the means of helping the seeker to seize the right and forsake the wrong.

The report of the United States Commissioner of Labor, shows that in the twenty years from 1881 to 1901 there were 22,793 strikes in the United States, involving over 6,000,000 workmen and 117,000 establish-educator and a refiner, and as the Christian, above all others, has cause for joy, he cannot do better than to express that joy in grateful strains, either by voice or instrument or both. Souls have been won through music. But see to it that evil music—those tunes and songs that are associated with low, vulgar, wicked sentiments—is rigidly excluded from your repertoire.

A Ride Through a Cuban Jungle

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

CUBA has great rolling plains. It also has dense forests. The plains are called savannas. Savanna means a sheet. And these plains covered with grass look like immense sheets which have no borders.

In the central province of Puerto Principe are found both the plains and the forests, the latter being mostly in the eastern part bordering Santiago. The savannas are the grazing regions which, in years gone by, were trodden by hundreds of thousands of heads of cattle and horses. They are again being filled with stock.

I know nothing more exhilarating than a day's ride across the grazing regions. The air is always balmy, and one feels the freedom of the Montana or the Kansas ranch. The Cuban cowboys do not equal our Western cowboys in handling their horses, but this is partly due to the fact that the ponies which they ride are not so strong and stubborn as the mustangs of the West. I have seldom seen a bucking broncho in Cuba. The native cowboys are like the Mexicans in their love for fine hats and showy, braided riding jackets. They also have very fine saddles, though these are not so easy for the riders as the McClellan saddle, which is the favorite with American horsemen. Their life is a wild, free one, without the drawback of winter snows and blizzards, which is felt in the Western States.

But while the grazing plains are full of charm for he who rides across them, for a really interesting ride filled with incidents it is necessary to strike through the few pathways which may be found in the forest jungle.

One such ride I took in the neighborhood of the Maximo River in the northeastern part of Puerto Principe. For my guide I had a Cuban who knew all the country and had known it from boyhood—a companion of Mr. J. A. Stutz, a Swiss, then living in Havana. He had lived much in Paris, but he found Cuban country life more to his liking than the gayest city in the world. My guide and I had ponies, while Mr. Stutz was astride a borrowed army mule.

The first thing I learned was that in most tropical woods the jungle is more dense overhead than under foot. The Cuban ponies would pick their way, sometimes up to their knees in sand and mud, but their riders were liable to be entangled in the meshes overhead. Our guide would clear the path with his machete, calling out to us "cuidado" (take care), as a heavy branch would swing back and deal us a stunning blow.

I was unhorsed twice and left hanging in the air, but the mishap was not serious. The guide would hack away the creepers with his machete, leaving me free to drop from the branches to the ground, where the pony was patiently waiting. I saw how very useful the machete is to the Cuban countryman, and why he always carries it. It is actually more than a knife, for it is a short sword. With it the native can cut his way through any kind of a jungle or chaparral.

I noticed that the Cuban woods of which so much is heard, were either very hard or very soft. While the trees were tall, few of them had trunks thicker than a man's body. Several varieties were like the hickory trees of the States, with slim, straight trunks running up sixty or seventy-five feet. Most of the woods were too hard for fuel. There is one variety which is called the axe breaker, or quebracha. It is so hard, that the axe, though wielded by the stoutest arm, rebounds from it made. Red cedar, which is very useful for building purposes, is quite common. There was also a tree which looked to me like black oak, and which I was told was ebony.

I had read of mahogany forests, and supposed they were like oak forests or any other forests. Therefore I did not understand why my Cuban guide laughed when I asked him to take me through the mahogany part of the forests. He was very polite in explaining that the mahogany had been taken off of this tract some years ago, or that it had been cleared.

"How can it have been cleared?" I asked, "when there is no clearing?" "We are in the midst of the woods here."

"Ah, Mr. American," he replied, "I meant that the mahogany trees which were here have been cleared, but we will hunt for the stumps."

So in the course of an hour he showed me three or four stumps of mahogany trees. They were a good distance apart. The truth as I learned it is that mahogany trees do not grow more than one or two to an acre. A tract of forest land which averages one mahogany to the acre is very good timber property. In the southeastern part of the Island along the river Cauto, the average is said to be a little more, but according to my Cuban guide there is no such thing as a mahogany forest. He said that that would be like having a gold mine at the root of every tree.

We rode for several miles getting deeper and deeper into the heart of the woods. It was wild and savage and tropical in its parasite vegetation. Our guide cleared the way for us through what seemed to be an impenetrable wilderness of creepers and overhanging branches. It was not alone the trunks of the trees which were wound round with vines and ivies. From their branches hung the creepers, many of them as thick as the wrist, striking down and taking root in the soil.

When we came out into the open we felt the full majesty of a tropical forest, but we did not know how dense the air had been until we breathed the purer atmosphere under the clear skies.

Our course then took us across a low savanna, which was dotted with dwarf palms. The Cubans call these dwarf palms guanias. At a distance they look like cactus plants. When the trunks get a larger growth and shoot up ten or twelve feet they are called juruguanas. These dwarf palms are everywhere the sign of poor soil, just as the royal palms are the sign of the rich soil which is the boundless wealth of Cuba. Where the dwarfs grow also grow scrubby trees and bushes. The prospect is almost as dreary as on the sage brush plains of the West, but happily there is much less of it.

It is not only because of its great grazing plains and its forests that the province of Puerto Principe is notable. Along the northern border is the town of Nuevitas, which has a magnificent harbor and is famous historically as the place where

Deadly Intoxicants

TEXT, Prov. 23: 32:

"AT THE LAST, IT BITETH LIKE A SERPENT AND STINGETH LIKE AN ADDER."

MY father has now been dead about six months. Since his demise, I have received scores of letters from many parts of this country, asking me to define my position on the temperance question. Only yesterday, a strong, earnest plea came from one of the New England States, which went something like this: "Your father's voice always rang true in his hatred for the wine-cup. Will you not come to our aid, and help the thousands of mothers who have drunken sons, and the wives who have drunken husbands, fight this relentless enemy of God and the home?" It is in answer to these letters that I shall state my belief and position upon the temperance question. But I speak with a broader purpose than merely to gratify curiosity. I want every man, woman and child who hates the saloon, and who is consecrated for a combined combat against this arch fiend of the centuries, to look upon me as a brother and a comrade. I pledge myself as the colleague of every foe of the intoxicating cup. At every opportunity, with voice and pen, I will thrust at this serpentine monster. It shall be my aim, as it should be the aim of every one of God's ministers, to rally, with all the influences at his command, the enemies of this hitherto invincible and unconquered foe of the human race. May God grant us to live to see the day when the fangs of this mighty monster shall have been extracted, and when its head shall have been crushed, and its vile carcass dismembered under the advancing hoofs of the white chargers of the Gospel army.

The evil of intoxication is a universal curse. Its long, slimy, twisting coils spread over every land, and are visible in every walk of life. There is hardly a man or woman sitting before me who has not had at least one near relative who has been cursed by the fatal bite of this crawling, insidious enemy. Perhaps that near relative was a father, a mother, an uncle, an aunt, a brother, a sister, a wife, a husband, or a child. Alas, many of us can say we have not only had one but many near relatives and friends who have gone down into drunkards' graves, after they have lived the hopeless and humanly helpless, degraded earthly existence of the drunkard. Even as I am preparing this sermon, news is published that a man who has filled high places in the service of his country, who bore a name honored in our history, has lost his life in a brawl, in which he would never have been involved if he had not indulged in intoxicating drink.

A Suggestive Comparison

Solomon compared the sin of intoxication to the writhings and twistings of a serpent, and to the stinging of an adder, because at that time poisonous serpents were everywhere. Every thicket was filled with a constellation of their gleaming eyes. Every desert was the home of the puff adder, lying half buried in the sand. Every swamp was the retreat of the water viper. Every hillside had, for the traveler, a warning hiss or rattle. Even unto this day, many of the countries of the East are overrun with poisonous reptiles. In India alone, over fifty thousand of the inhabitants annually die from poisonous snake-bites.

The deadly serpents can multiply almost indefinitely, in the wild, undeveloped region of a virgin soil. Humboldt, the celebrated German scientist, gave this description of one of his travels: "In the savannahs of Essequibo, in Guiana, I saw the most wonderful and terrible of spectacles. We were ten men on horseback, two of whom took the lead in order to sound the passages, whilst I preferred to skirt the green forest. One of the black men who formed the vanguard returned at full gallop, and said to me, 'Come here, sir, and see serpents in a pile!' He pointed out to me something elevated in the middle of the savannahs, which appeared like a pile of arms. One of my companions said: 'This must be one of those assemblages of serpents which heap themselves on each other after a violent tempest. I have heard of such but have never seen any. Let us be cautious and not go too near.' When we were within twenty paces of it, the terror of our horses prevented our nearer approach, to which, however, none of us were inclined. Suddenly the pyramided mass became agitated. Frightful hissings issued from it. Thousands of serpents rolled spirally on each other. They shot their hideous heads out of the circles, presenting their fiery eyes at us. I then thought what could be the design of this numerous assemblage? I concluded that this species of serpent dreaded some colossal enemy, and they united themselves, after having seen this enemy, in order to attack or resist it in the mass." So, to-day, the serpents of the wine-cup attack singly or en masse. They are everywhere, and find their prey in all ranks of society. The widespread curse of the wine-cup was very strikingly compared to the fatal serpents of the Solomonic era, which were almost everywhere. But, unlike the serpents which have almost disappeared before our advancing civilization, the trails of the adders of intoxication are even more multitudinous now than ever before.

The Common Enemy

The serpents of intoxication have increased so rapidly, that they are now innumerable. We hear their hiss in almost every legislative hall. We see their eyes gleaming out of almost every palace. We find them lying under the orange blossoms of the marriage altar, as well as in the detention hospitals for the patients who have their rooms filled with the coiling serpents of delirium tremens. We find many of our statesmen paralyzed by the glance of this adder's eyes, as a poor, little, frightened sparrow might tremble and crouch, until she falls into the open mouth of the blacksnake which has charmed her. We find that even a few of the ministers who fill the pulpits of the Gospel of Jesus Christ are terrorized by the sight of the serpent of intoxication, because the rich brewer may be the president of the Board of Trustees, or the wealthy distiller's family may be the largest contributors to the financial support of the church. The curse of sinful intoxicants is universal, therefore all Christian people—and that includes you and me—should band themselves together for its extinction. We should deal with the serpent of strong drink in the same way the travelers over the western prairies deal with the rattlesnakes. There it is a universally obeyed law that every man shall kill every rattlesnake he may see. It ought also to be a universally obeyed Christian law that every Christian should strike at the hideous head of the Satanic adder of intoxication, whenever it reveals itself or lifts its fatal poisonous fangs to strike.

There are four distinct reasons for hating this serpentine evil of intoxicants—four distinct reasons to wage against it unsparring and relentless warfare. The first is because the serpent of intoxicants destroys a man's brain, dethroning his reason and utterly ruining his mental capacity for any kind of important work. As a merchant, he will enter into wild-cat speculations, until often his whole fortune is swept away. As a physician, he will unfit himself for the sick-room. As a lawyer, he will ruin his practice, because he can no longer plead in the court-room as he once could plead. And everywhere, the cry will be raised about this poor, drunken, mental wreck, no matter in what sphere of life he may live: "Make way! Make way! Leave him alone. He drinks! He drinks!"

When a man begins to drink intoxicants, his mental usefulness is inevitably weakened. The temperance lecturers sometimes neglect to press home this appalling fact, when they dwell upon the vast amount of money which is annually spent in a national liquor bill. They tell us that one seventy-fifth of all the American race is every year engaged in the manufacture and the sale of intoxicants. They assert that $900,000,000 are spent annually for accursed drink. They affirm that a great army of over 50,000 men and women living in the city of Chicago, devote their entire time to running the places of evil resorts which are chiefly kept open through the influence of strong drink. The amount spent every year upon a national liquor bill is appalling, but that is one of the least of the evils. Many a rich man could easily afford to spend five, or ten, or even twenty thousand dollars annually for liquors, if the evil ended there. But no man, not even John D. Rockefeller, rich as he is, can afford to drink intoxicating liquors. When a man is addicted to strong drink, he is heading towards mental as well as physical depletion and annihilation.

A Ruinous Habit

The evil results of a man's mind long weakened by intoxicants are very far-reaching. We read with amazement how a boa-constrictor can swallow down a calf or kid or deer, apparently five times wider than the natural size of the serpent's throat. But every country boy has seen the same phenomena upon a smaller scale. A snake, with a throat hardly larger than your little finger, will give chase to a large, fat toad. It will then gather together the two hind legs of the toad and, by suction, slowly draw the whole body down his throat and into the stomach. Then, if the country boy will pick up the snake by the tail, and snap him as he would a whip-cord, the serpent's mouth will open and the toad will be ejected, alive and well, as was Jonah when thrown from the mouth of the big fish, after he had been voyaging for three days in its internal cavity. But though the student of serpentology may wonder at the size of a big toad, which a small snake is able to swallow, his wonderment ought to be as nothing, compared to the utter astonishment with which he sees the huge meal which the serpent of intoxication can swallow, after the brain of its victim has been wrecked by strong drink. Without any apparent effort it can swallow down the merchant's store, the minister's pulpit, the lawyer's office, the surgeon's operating table, the mechanic's bench, the engineer's engine, the sea captain's ship. And mark you, in order that the Solomonic serpent may accomplish this gastronomic feat its victim does not have to be intoxicated all the time. All that the minister has to do to lose his pulpit is to reel as a drunkard—just once. All that the engineer has to do to wreck his train is to be drunk—just once. All that the physician has to do to make a wrong diagnosis and kill his patient is to be drunk—just once. On account therefore, of the becloudment of a man's intellect, and the unseating of the human reason through the influence of the wine-cup, I hate the Solomonic adder with an intense hatred. I hate it with unutterable loathing. I hate it as God wants every Christian to hate sin.

The serpent of intoxication can destroy a man's heart as well as his head. We read of a bridegroom who took his young bride to a cabin, upon the hillside of the Rocky Mountains. The young husband, unknowingly, built his home over a den of snakes. After the married couple had retired for the night, the first they had lighted on that cold winter night warmed the dormant serpents into life. They came forth into the room of the sleeping couple. They crawled up upon the bed. They buried their cruel fangs in the flesh of man and woman alike and the nuptial couch became the bed of death. When a husband looks upon the wine when it is red, he always builds his home over a den of vipers. He lets the poisonous serpents crawl up into his bed, and not only slay his body but also poison his love for his wife and his children; for his parents and his brothers and sisters; for all who ought to be near and dear to him, and whom he ought to love better than his own life.

Far-Reaching Mischiefs

A drunkard's heart through the touch of the adder of intoxication, not only becomes a poisoned heart, but the merciless heart of an inhuman monster. In order to drink, a drunkard is willing practically to go to any extreme. He is ready to let wife and children starve. He has known two drunkards who were willing to sell their own flesh and blood into a life of crime, in order that they might get liquor with which to satisfy their diabolical thirst. These two drunkards were not men of the lowest social rank. They were men who were born in as good families as yours or mine. But why continue in this strain? Is there any need of my longer describing how the serpent of intoxication can destroy a man's love for his wife and his children? No. In the rags of the factories we see it; in the scandals of the divorce courts we read it; in the horrors of the reformatory schools we can prove it. Let us pass on, to our indictment of this coiling serpent of the wine-cup.

The Solomonic serpentine evil destroys a man's soul as well as the temporal usefulness of his brain, and the loving power of his heart. This is not a pleasant subject to touch. It is not pleasant, because many of us have had friends, dear friends, who have met, or are to-day on the way to meet a drunkard's doom. But, my brother, we must be true to the living as well as to the dead. If you had a loved one who was contemplating the commission of a heinous crime, what would you do? Why, you would go to that friend, and say, "Brother, if you do this, you will have to pass many years in jail. If you allow your angry passions to rise and commit murder, you will have to sit in the electric chair, or stand under the hangman's noose. That is the law. That is the law, which has been carried out in many instances in the past, and will be carried out in many instances in the future."

Now, my friend, what is the Divine punishment that will be meted out to all who have been slain by the sting of the Solomonic adder. Let me read part of just one verse, from the Divine Criminal Code. Shall the drunkard inherit heaven? What says the epistle of First Corinthians? "Be not deceived: neither idolaters, adulterers, nor thieves, nor drunkards shall inherit the kingdom of God." There is no need of reading further. That simple Pauline sentence covers the whole ground. It seems to harmonize with the Icelander's idea of hell which is to be a great ice palace, the walls of which are covered with a huge mass of swaying, swinging serpents. Their forked tongues and hissing throats converge to a common centre, where the condemned of God crouch and tremble and weep. Shall we not fight this serpent of intoxication, which may aptly be compared to the Icelander's satanic serpents in the palace of the Inferno? Shall we not, one and all, fight the serpents

How a Wicked Town Was Transformed

IT WAS YAMPA, IN THE ROCKIES, AND DIVINE GRACE HAS WROUGHT WONDERS THERE

A RIDE of nearly two hundred miles in a stage-coach through the canyons and over the mountains of Colorado during the latter part of July, gave me a new view of the vastness of that State and of its spiritual needs.

Exchanging a comfortable seat in the train for a springless one in a clumsy stage at Wolcott, I had the first taste of the hardships of the people among the hills. With passengers, trunks, express and numerous other things filling our vehicle, and myself perched high up on the driver's seat, we went to the little post-office and waited until faithful Uncle Sam had loaded on his mail bags, which were to be carried to the people who had left all in other States and lands and come to seek their health or fortune in the wilds of Colorado. When all was ready, the driver mounted his seat, and picking up his four reins he gave the signal which started them to their work. Taking his great whip from its socket and swinging it with a wide sweep above his head, he brought it down with a snap over the ears of the leading team, which sent them all on a wild gallop down the valley to the foot of the neighboring hill. Thus we started on the long haul of eighty miles to Steamboat Springs. Words seem powerless to describe the weird loneliness and desolation of the country for the first thirty miles. The mountains are high and rugged, the valleys narrow and barren. Sometimes we would speed long close beside some mountain brook, and perhaps, in half an hour, would be looking at the same brook from a thousand feet above. The ascent was often steep and rocky, which made the horses bend low to the ground to drag the lumbering load to the summit. Then down the other side, at a wild breakneck speed, the whole caravan would madly rush, swinging around sharp curves with reckless daring, the wheels sometimes going within a foot of a precipice, over which, if they had gone, it might have meant no stopping place until the creek bed was reached five hundred or one thousand feet below, where passengers, teams and coach would have lain in a confused, lifeless heap.

It was six o'clock on that Saturday night when we reached the town of Yampa, forty-five miles from the place we started in the morning. An appointment had been made for me to remain there over Sunday to assist Rev. Frank Fulkerson, pastor of the Congregational Church, who was once a student at the Moody Institute. He has been on the field about two months. I found the history of the church interesting indeed. There has been preaching in the town about two years. Last spring, a converted cowboy engaged an evangelist to come and hold meetings. The results were excellent, and a Congregational church of sixty-five members was organized. Previous to this revival, Yampa had the reputation of being the wickedest town in Rout County. On Sunday, the cowboys regularly gathered for a day of carousing. Horse-racing, broncho-breaking, lassoing wild cattle, gambling and drinking, occupied the day, closing quite frequently with a fight. The nights were spent in gambling in the saloons.

Now all is changed. Men who once spent their nights around the card-table, and their money in the gaming-pot, now spend their evenings at church and their money to advance the cause of Christ. Some who were once the lowest gamblers are now Spirit-filled Christians, and the leading men of the town are members of the church.

Rev. Fulkerson recently asked one of the saloon-keepers, as he met him in the morning:

"How is business?"

The saloon-keeper replied, as if craving his sympathy,

"Business used to be very bright, but now I do not take in more than a dollar a day, and my license is $325 a year. Something is the matter with the ranchmen, for when they come to town now, they do not call at the saloon and have a social drink as they used to do. They buy their groceries, and go right back home again."

Thus the saloon-keeper unwittingly testified to the power of the Cross of Christ in Yampa.

During the two months Mr. and Mrs. Fulkerson have been on the field, eight have been converted, and seventeen have joined the church. One woman, fifty years of age, who had not heard a sermon for twenty years, was among those converted.

The attendance at the services was formerly but a mere handful. It now numbers 150 at the Sunday services, and fifty at prayer-meeting.

Going to church there is not an easy thing. The farthest attendant lives eighteen miles away, while several live at a distance of eight miles. One family comes seven miles regularly to prayer-meeting. One woman drives twelve miles alone, and another eight, each bringing three small children, one a babe in arms. Ought not this to shame some who live next door to the church in the city, and yet do not find it convenient to go?

Two thousand dollars were readily given for a church building which is to seat two hundred people, and a parsonage will be built on the lot beside it. The pastor's salary is paid promptly in advance, and the church is now planning to support a native missionary to represent them in the foreign land.

The three services it was my privilege to hold in the town-hall, which is their present meeting-place, were meetings long to be remembered. The seats are planks laid on sawed blocks, and are very uncomfortable; yet so hungry were the people for the Bread of Life, that they listened with rapt attention to the teaching of the Bible for an hour at each service, and after the last meeting (which closed at ten o'clock), they said they would have been glad to have listened until midnight. Some of these people remain all day and night at the hotel, so anxious are they to attend the worship of the house of God.

DEADLY INTOXICANTS

Sermon by Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage

of intoxication, which can and do destroy happiness on the other side of the grave, as well as that of the life which is on this side?

The Solomonic evil can not only destroy a father's or a mother's temporal and eternal life, but it ruins their children also, because the drunkard's evil habit is inheritable. The drunkard's curse, which rests upon the parent's life, can be transmitted by the flow of blood into the veins of the father's children and is children's children. Every physician is ready to testify that it is far easier for a drunkard's son to become a drunkard, than for a child whose parents have ever been cursed by the sting of the fatal adder of intoxication. So, my brother, as the Mohammedan others look upon the serpent as sacred, and allow the enormous cobra to crawl into their cradles and sting their little ones to death; you, if you are addicted to the curse of drink, are not only destroying your own souls, but you are also destroying the immortal lives of the unborn generation. By looking upon the wine-cup when it is red, you are preparing the way to look into the bloodshot eyes, and to listen to the blaspheming tongues of your children's children, who shall meet you at the judgment seat of Christ to arraign you for the use of their evil inheritance, and to curse you and to curse the day you were born.

But my subject is vast. I must forego much of what would like to say in arraigning this serpentine monster, and pass on to briefly discuss the means with which, by the grace of God, we can destroy it. And in this discussion I shall not touch on the power of the blot box. That is a theme in itself.

The sure antidote for the poison of the adder of intoxication must be found for Christians, first and last, all the time, in the blood of Jesus Christ. It is right to use human agencies for the cure of inebriety, but I believe human agencies will always fail unless they are blessed by the Divine power—by the power of the Holy Ghost. As a pastor and preacher and temperance worker, I have personally tried to aid in the rescue of many drunkards. I have helped send some to the reformatory institutions. I have taken them into my own home, and bought them medicines from the drugstores. I am free to confess that all these human agencies failed, except when those victims of strong drink have thrown themselves into the arms of God, and clung to Jesus Christ as their only Saviour.

Oh, ye victims of the wine-cup! Oh, ye helpless men and women, who have long struggled in the relentless coils of the Satanic serpent, which are stronger and more merciless than those of the great serpent, 120 feet long, of which Pliny once wrote. I beg and plead with you to seek rescue from your besetting sin in the blood of Jesus Christ. Divine reinforcement saved John B. Gough. Divine reinforcement saved Francis Murphy. Divine reinforcement saved Captain Barbour of Pittsburgh. Divine reinforcement can save you, if you will live so close to Christ that Christ can and will live close to you. Divine reinforcement alone can save the drunkard, who is heading towards a drunkard's grave.

This premise being true, that Jesus Christ alone is the only sure antidote for the suicidal thirst of strong drink, the next step in our temperance reformation should be to open all the churches in our Christian land for great temperance meetings. Every minister of the Gospel should preach, and continue to preach, the Gospel of teetotalism. Every pulpit of every church should be a broad, white desk, before which the victims of strong drink could bow at the throne of grace for mercy, and then arise and with trembling hand sign the temperance pledge, and blot it then and there, with their falling tears of penitence. The Church of the Lord Jesus Christ must and shall lead in this successful temperance reform. The Church of the Lord Jesus Christ can destroy the saloon, if she does her full duty, as the prayer-meetings of the country meeting destroyed the political candidacy of Robert G. Ingersoll for the Governorship of Illinois. The Temperance movement will fail, and surely fail, if it is carried on purely as a secular movement. It will win and surely win, if it is carried on as a Divine movement, in which is enlisted the strong arm of a church inspired of the Holy Spirit. It is by you that the call for a Gospel charge against the grog-shops must first be sounded.

Lastly, and most important of all, with the help of the Church of God, we should try to kill the adder of strong drink by making our civil laws so stringent that the young should find it almost impossible to get at the wine-cup, even if they would. It is easier to keep one hundred young men from acquiring the evil habit of strong drink, than it is to reform one debauched drunkard. It is easier to prevent than to reform sin. I suppose the chronic drunkards, who have been drinking for twenty or thirty years, will find their poisonous serpent of the wine-cup, no matter where they may be. But it is possible by law to protect the young. It is possible by law to keep liquor away from the young men and the young women. It is possible to protect the rising generation so that they may not be able to find this adder's lair and to feel his foul breath or his poisonous fangs.

And not only by stringent laws should the destroying wine-cup be kept from the young, but the young should also be taught why the debauching influence of strong drink is kept out of their reach. The evil results of indulgence in the wine-cup should be taught in our public schools as well as in our Sabbath Schools. They should be taught upon the public platforms as they are in the private home. The evils of strong drink should be presented so clearly and vehemently to the young that the rising generation should some day, by the grace of God, be able to stand up in their might and declare that America must and shall forever be free from the evils of strong drink.

Christian men and women, North, East, South, and West, let us one and all rally to the temperance cause. Let the ministers consecrate the pulpits to this work. Let the laymen consecrate the pews. May we one and all be ready to die for the temperance cause, but never to surrender; never to cease fighting the saloon and its entrenched power, until we are summoned before the Great White Throne of heaven. Never, never, never let up in the struggle against this hemispheric evil until the home, and the church, and the kingdom of God shall forever be free. May God give us, one and all, supernatural strength for this struggle.

The Great Blessings of Life

CROSSING THE JORDAN

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 12
JOSHUA 3: 9-17

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." ISA. 43: 2

"ONE wide river to cross," that is the only obstacle that now lies between the Israelites and the Promised Land. Their tents are folded, their garments girded as for a journey; sandals are on their feet, and their staffs are in their hands. They number in all something over two millions, 601,730 of whom are men, the others women and children. There are no bridges, no boats by which to cross that river, now in flood tide, and flowing with torrent-like swiftness. But the command has been given that they shall go forward. Do the people draw back and say "Impossible?" We are not told of any faint-hearted ones this time. We must think that all have come to the supreme moment with strong hearts. For three days Joshua's aids have been going through the camp, from tent to tent, telling the people in minutest details of the crossing as God had planned it. They have been told that the priests bearing the ark of the covenant will be the first to move, and that their advance will be the signal for a general movement along the whole line. But a space of two thousand cubits (three fifths of a mile) must always be maintained between the priests and the people, in order that they may clearly follow their guide. The people have also been told that as soon as the feet of the priests touch the brink of Jordan, God will roll back the waters, and make a dry path for their coming. Some stout hearts, full of faith, are saying, "Did he not do it at the Red Sea, and can he not do it again? That was more difficult than this, for the Red Sea was wider and deeper than the Jordan." Joshua himself encourages the people by saying, "This wonderful thing that God is about to do shall be the sure sign of his promise that, when you are come into the Promised Land, he will give you strength to drive out the evil people who are now in possession of the land—the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Hivites, the Perizzites, the Girgashites, the Amorites, and the Jebusites."

And Joshua still further strengthens their courage by saying: "While you are crossing over, the priests with the ark shall stand in the midst of the path with the ark of the covenant. As the ark represents God, it will be the same as if God himself were standing in the midst." Thus Joshua teaches the people to encourage themselves in God.

"And lest you forget," he goes on to say, "and that you may also teach your children concerning this wonderful thing God is about to do, let a man out of each tribe be chosen, twelve men in all, to build a stone memorial of it."

The host is now crossing. There is no need of hurrying or pushing, for the path is broad, about twenty miles perhaps, for we are told that at the city of Aram the waters rose up in a heap, and Aram was fifteen or twenty miles up stream from the place where Israel had been encamped. The crossing is not long, a little over one-eighth of a mile, not much longer than two city blocks, about 600 feet, even though the river is in flood tide.

The people have now almost crossed in a steady column, strengthened by their faith in God. How sublime is the sight! A few hours have sufficed to bring them all to the other side. How great is their rejoicing! And now the twelve stones are being brought from the midst of the path by the twelve men who were appointed to build a memorial on the Canaan side of the river. And twelve other memorial stones are being set up in the middle of the river bed where the priests have stood with the ark of God.

And now the wall of water has broken and Jordan is itself again.

Illustration and Application

Joshua rose up early (ver. 1). Joshua was in earnest and so an early riser, like all successful people. And it was for God's business, not his own, he rose thus early. "Early" and "earnestly" are synonyms in the Bible. "They that seek me early shall find me," is not a promise to childhood, but to earnestness in all ages. The idea is, that people who are in earnest to do anything, will be up and at it early. In these luxurious times, the vacant seats at breakfast in many a home, tell of shallow views of life. One may sin by omission, as well as commission, and many young Christians, and older ones, too, especially in well-to-do families, forget that to do well is as much a command of God, as not to do ill. And it is also God's command that we should be earnest and busy. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." The late sleeping on Sunday morning, in contrast with the early rising on other days for school and business, proclaims by deeds that speak louder than words that we are only half in earnest in studying God's Word and will, and doing the "Father's business."

They came to the Jordan (ver. 1). The Israelites, almost forty years before, had been as near Canaan, and had lost it by doubt. This generation was to enter in. Thus, we are reminded, that children need not repeat the sins of their fathers. Heredity is mighty, but faith in God may overcome it. Degeneration is more than offset by regeneration. What a picture is this Jordan scene of opportunities that come to men in every age! The same opportunity which one loses by fear and hesitation, another improves and finds it the way to success. In the teaching of this lesson all around the world by faithful teachers, many a boy and girl, many a man and woman, will come to their Jordan, to the hour of a supreme choice, from which some will go into the wilderness for forty years, and some forever; while others will go from it into their Land of Promise.

The people removed from their tents to pass over Jordan. Most of the transitions of life are like those of nature, gradual and almost unconscious. As night passes into day, and spring into summer, so childhood passes into youth, and youth into manhood and womanhood. Even conversion and character development are mostly "like the dawning light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." But there are great crossings, crises, choices, in every noble life, when some Canaan comes in sight, with a flooded Jordan intervening, and the will must choose to trust in God and cross, or turn back in doubt and fear. Among the great crossings in individual lives are the choice of an occupation, the choice of a life companion, the choice of a political or business policy, the choice of amusements. But the supreme choice for time is that of conversion, of which the human part is to open the heart's door to Christ as Saviour and King, as he waits there, saying: "If any man will open the door, I will come in." When man's will has acted, the divine will completes the work.

"I want to be a Christian," said Mary Plummer to her pastor, "but the difficulties in my way seem insurmountable."

"The Lord can remove your difficulties, or give you grace to overcome them. If you truly wish to be his child, can you not trust him to help you?"

"But my trouble is one which cannot be removed. At least it looks so to me. It is my brother Henry. He is very much opposed to religion; thinks Christians are either fanatics or hypocrites, and that religion stands in the way of all true enjoyment. He is absent in Europe now, but will return soon, and expects me to spend the winter with him at Washington in a round of gaieties which would be inconsistent with a religious life. If I become a Christian, I shall forfeit his love, lose his society, and perhaps deprive myself of a home; for I am wholly dependent upon my brother. My dear pastor, what shall I do?"

"ALL ISRAEL PASSED OVER ON DRY GROUND"

"That is a question, Mary, which you must decide for yourself; remembering your accountability to Him who has said, 'Give me thine heart'; remembering also that Christ, while declaring 'whoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven,' has at the same time graciously assured us that his 'yoke is easy' and his 'burden is light.'"

It took indeed almost a martyr's courage for that young girl to attempt the crossing of the Jordan, which stood between her soul and the Saviour. But having counted the cost, she decided to go forward; and the Lord in whom she trusted opened a safe path for her feet. Nay, more than this; he rewarded her trust by making her the instrument of bringing her brother also to the heavenly Canaan.

When they that bare the ark were come unto the Jordan the waters which came down from above stood.—In the beginning and in every other stage of Christian life, it is always safe to follow God, even though he leads through seeming perils. The Jordan stands not for conversion alone, but in the sermons and songs of the ages it pictures, the perils and troubles through which God calls us to pass. Let us translate the golden text into its deeper meanings: "When thou passest through troubles I will be with thee, and through perils they shall not overflow thee." In the Portuguese hymn we sing, in triumphant strain, like Miriam after the crossing of the Red Sea, and as Israel doubtless sang again beyond the Jordan:

When through the deep waters I call thee to go,
The rivers of sorrow shall not overflow,
For I will be with thee thy troubles to bless,
And sanctify to thee thy deepest distress.

Only by sorrow does it seem possible for God to sanctify us, and only when we are sanctified—purged of our sin and selfishness—can he fulfill that promise which is true in every age, "Sanctify yourselves, for to-morrow Jehovah will do wonders among you." The wonderful songs, the wonderful lives are to-day's harvest from yesterday's sorrows.

And all Israel passed over on dry ground, until all the nation were passed clear over (v. 17). This recalls the dialogue in Shakespeare's "Tempest":

Miranda—How came we ashore?

Prospero—By providence divine.

There is no special harm in making the crossing of the Jordan an illustration of death, with the "Better Land" beyond, unless that illustrative use shuts out the greater spiritual truth which the story represents, that we are to cross in this world by conversion and sanctification from the wilderness of a life of sin and doubt and fear into the better life of holiness and faith and service. Our sins are to be covered by the waters of forgetfulness, as the twelve stones piled in the river bed were covered by the returning flood. Crossing the Jordan was not the end, but only the commencement of Canaan's conquest, and so pictures not the end of conflict with sin in death, but the great beginning of triumph over it by complete consecration, in which we leave our wandering life behind in one great act of trustful obedience, in which we decide to follow God wherever he may lead. Let us not get angry over theories of sanctification, but by one deliberate decision of the will, leave the wilderness of half-hearted service behind and enter the Canaan of self-conquest.

The personal lessons of this incident are but indirect illustrations. Its direct message is of God's dealings with nations. It will be profitable on this anniversary of the discovery of America, to consider the great crossings in the providential history of the world. When Xerxes was marching upon Greece with his seemingly resistless army of a million men, God stayed his course by a flooded and turbulent river, into which, in impotent rage, he threw chains, as if to punish and imprison it. That delay helped to save Greece and civilization by giving the Greeks added time for successful defense. How striking the contrast when a greater King, eternal, immortal, invisible, was leading the host of Israel from Egypt and twice found a flood across his path. "The sea saw him and fled, Jordan was driven back. What ailed thee, O sea, that thou fleddest, thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?"

Behold Caesar at the Rubicon, a popular general, who would rather be first in a little Iberian village than second in Rome. His orders were to operate beyond the Rubicon. To cross it would be to rebel against the Roman government. His whole future hung in the balance. He crossed the Rubicon and made himself the foremost ruler of the world, and Rome a mightier nation than ever before. With these river stories of rulers, let us put the story of President Garfield, who on taking his inauguration oath, kissed in his mother's Bible the text, "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as he will it." Let us then pray for God's guidance of our rulers, to make them rivers of blessing. And let us ourselves select rulers, willing to follow God's providential leadings. Surely our country has come at this time to a great crisis morally. Babylon was captured by the Persian army turning the river which flowed under its wall out of its course, and entering the city in the dry river bed. We can save our country from the fate of Babylon, Greece, Rome and other great empires destroyed by their immorality, only by working with God to turn back the river of vice and crime that is now at flood tide. Beyond that dark river there awaits us a "better land," if we as Christian citizens will but enter in.

God of nations, pilot ours,
Thou Power behind the powers!
Breathe thy life into our sails,
Save us from the threatening gales.

The priests that bare the ark stood firm on dry ground. It has been the experience of many Christian men that obedience, even when it seemed suicidal, has been followed by an unexpected removal or transformation of obstacles. Christ bade certain lepers to go and show themselves to the priests (Luke 17: 14). It seemed ridiculous for them to go before they were cleansed, because the existence of the disease was obvious, and the priest would simply send them back into seclusion. But they obeyed in spite of the apparent absurdity, and as they went they were cleansed. Dr. Talmag used to use as an illustration of this principle the tradition of the Indians, that Manatou on his travels came to a hedge of thorns from which the eyes of wild beasts glared at him, and beyond this an impassable river. He hesitated a moment but then proceeded, and the thicket, the beasts and the river proved to be only phantoms which faded into air when Manatou marched upon them. So do obstacles disappear before the man who trusts in God's power to sustain him in obedience.

MISS HELEN'S EXPERIMENT

By E. H. FOSTER

CHAPTER I.

A Novel Transformation

THE park was very quiet that afternoon. In the shade of a great elm a little girl, perhaps eight years old, played with a gorgeous doll, arrayed, like its mistress, in sumptuous apparel. A few feet away, from behind a protecting shrub, another little girl gazed in wistful loneliness at this unattainable bliss. Two ladies came chatting down the path.

"Della," exclaimed one, stopping short, just look at those children with those dear little brown curls all over their heads. Did you ever see a more striking resemblance? They are as like as two peas—ve for the clothes," she added with a laugh, as she resumed her walk.

"Poor little thing!" murmured the other, with her eyes on the forlorn little figure of the ragged calico standing motionless in the shadow of the shrub. "Do you know, lights like that just make me rage—the equality of it all! Yes, they do look like—strangely so," said she, as the trees hid them from view.

The small owner of the doll glanced at the fast-disappearing ladies, then gazed with mild curiosity at her suddenly discovered companion.

"Little girl, come here," commanded the one in tones indicative of accustomed authority.

The child came obediently, with longing eyes still fixed on the doll.

"What's your name?"

"Sally Perkins."

"Has your nurse gone courting, too?"

"Hain't got no nurse," said Sally, shifting her wandering eyes from the doll to the other's mistress.

"Oh, my! You haven't? That must be jolly fun. Wish I hadn't. Mine's over there—see?" said she, pointing through the trees where the burly figure of a policeman almost hid from sight the white cap and apron of a trim nursemaid.

Sally nodded and looked back to the other.

Silence for a brief minute.

"Don't you want to know my name?" suddenly demanded the doll's mistress, picking up the offending toy and hiding under her dress in a fit of unconscious jealousy.

Sally lifted two reproachful eyes.

"Yea; but I'druther know hern," said the other, with a motion toward the hidden treasure.

"My name's Helen Morton," replied the young personage sweetly, blissfully regarding the candidly expressed wish of her new acquaintance. "I'm lonesome—you may talk to me!" she announced graciously.

Sally shifted uneasily from one bare foot to the other, and said nothing. By and by her roving eyes spied a doll's ruffled slipper peeping from beneath the folds of a dainty, embroidered skirt. Her attention was riveted at once.

"Well, why don't you talk?" demanded Helen, wrathfully, following with her eyes the other's wistful gaze until it led to the ruffled slipper. "O dear suz me! Well, make it," said she despairingly, dragging the doll out from its prison. "Didn't you ever see a doll before?"

"Oh, not like this one!" murmured Sally, rapturously touching the pretty dress and hair with reverent fingers.

Helen looked at her with new curiosity.

"Why, I've got lots of them," said she wonderingly. "Have n't you got any—just a little tiny one?"

"Hain't got nothin' but one made o' rags. I can't have 'em like this," wistfully.

"You, can't? Why, not?"

"Cause I can't," shortly; then with a quick change of voice, "Say, do you have any we want ter eat?"

Helen nodded, in some surprise; "Cept cake and preserves," she admitted ruefully.

Sally heaved a long sigh.

"You live in an awful nice house, too, don't ye?" she queried.

"Why—yes; don't you?"

"Are all yer clo's like this one?" she continued, just touching the embroidered skirt.

"This? Pooh! This isn't much. You'd ought to see my party dresses, all bows and ribbons, and—why, what's the matter?"

Sally had dug both little fists into her eyes and burst into a storm of sobs.

"I don't care—'t aint fair, an' I know it. God ain't playin' fair. I hain't got nothin'—not nothin' at all; an' you've—you've—"

"Sally Perkins, stop that this minute," commanded the shocked Helen. "It's not proper for little girls like you to find fault with God—now, what's the matter?"

"Well, I don't care," said Sally, subdued, but sullen. "You've got everythin', an' it ain't fair—so there. I don't live in this cubby-hole in the bushes. There, now, take off your dress and your hat—I'm going to put them on!" and she began tugging at the fastenings of her own pretty gown.

Before the whirlwind of Helen's determination Sally was powerless, and mechanically did as she was bid. Her face was wreathed with smiles as she slipped into the unaccustomed dainty apparel, while Helen tried not to cry as she donned the dingy calico—she had already taken off her shoes and stockings and given them to Sally.

"Now, when nurse comes back she'll take you home. Don't say anything to her until she finds it out, then tell her you've come to take my place for a few days," said Helen, with airy nonchalance. "Mamma's gone; so's papa; they are not coming back until next Saturday. Maybe we'll change around again by that world of woe in her voice. "Sally, I—I don't know's I have done just right;" then with a sudden remembrance of the doughnut dinner, "Yes, I have, too. It isn't fair for me to have all the good things. It's—"

At that moment the nurse appeared at the upper end of the path, consternation on her face, for the lengthening shadows told of approaching night.

"Miss Helen, didn't I tell you not to leave that tree? Come here at once," she called, as she walked rapidly toward them.

From sheer force of habit, the real, but ragged, Helen started to obey.

"Go away, you dirty child. Don't you know more than to hang round your betters like this?" said the irate nurse, who had now reached the girls. She thrust aside the ragged child as she spoke, and taking the hand of the beautiful Sally, started off at a brisk pace through the park.

"MISS HELEN, DIDN'T I TELL YOU NOT TO LEAVE THAT TREE?"

nothin' but a shanty; an' just look at this old thing"—tugging at the despised calico—"an' I hain't had no dinner but a doughnut. I—I'm hungry—awful hungry!"

Helen was plainly disturbed.

"Sally—only a doughnut?"

Sally nodded.

"Then—it isn't fair," said Helen, with firm, but sorrowful conviction. "Sally, something must be done!"

"There ain't nothin' can be done," murmured Sally; then she fairly jumped, so sudden and vehement was the exclamation that fell from Helen's lips.

"I've got it! Didn't that lady say we looked alike? I'm going to be you and you can be me, until—well, until a few days, anyway."

"Why, we can't!"

"Course we can; here, quick, come into time," she added, with the suggestion of a break in her voice. "Maybe I'll be hungry, then—oh, I most forgot—where do you live?"

Sally walked stiffly out of their impromptu dressing-room, and switched her skirts happily, hugging the precious doll close to her heart. Helen followed slowly, cautiously picking her way among the small stones in the path. She remembered now that she had often begged to go barefoot—she shouldn't any more.

"Tain't far; I'll show ye, it's right through here," said Sally, leading the way down a winding path that led to the edge of the park, where a dismal street stretched its unattractive length. "There, do you see that little brown shanty with the gate on th' ground 'side that rickety old fence? That's it."

"That!" exclaimed Helen, in dismay, a

Helen looked after them with a strange mixture of feelings; then she set herself to having a good time—such a very good time, with no nurse to bother.

She buried her pink and white toes in the soft grass by the side of the path, then jumped in consternation as a cricket alighted on her foot. She played with the tame squirrels a little. She danced and capered about in forced hilarity until a small round stone and the ball of her foot came into painful contact. Then she suddenly discovered that she was hungry. It was with a sinking heart that she started for the little brown house.

For the first time she wondered what would be her reception in Sally's home. She looked dubiously at the broken fence, and picked her way gingerly among the tin cans and dirty papers in front of the house; then she timidly opened the door.

"Well, ye lazy thing, I should think 'twas time ye showed up. Where ye ben?" snarled a voice.

Helen's face changed from white to red, but she said nothing.

The woman advanced and shook her roughly.

"Lost yer tongue, Sally? I'll see 't ye find it! Where ye ben, I say?"

Helen imperiously shook herself free.

"Let me go—I'm not Sally!"

At the tones of the girl's voice, the woman started, then she laughed harshly.

"Ain't Sally? Well, my fine lady, what airs ye tryin' to put on now? Yer'd better change yer clo's 'fore ye say't ye ain't Sally. Come—quit yer nonsense and tend to that brat of a baby; the little imp's ben howlin'," said she, giving the girl a brutal push.

Helen flushed angrily.

"I will thank you to keep your hands off from me. I am not your Sally. I am Helen Morton, come to take her place for a few days," said the small maid, with the pomposity of eight years of absolute rule.

The woman fell back limply, and dropped into a chair.

"Well, I snum—if this don't beat all? I'll be jiggered if it don't! But where's Sally—my Sally?" asked she, with suddenly awakened maternal solicitude. "Them's her things," pointing to the ragged gown.

"She has gone to live in my house for a few days," vouchsafed Helen, with dignity. "I didn't think it was fair for me to have all the nice times." Then she added anxiously, "I want to do just what she did, Mrs.—er—Mrs. Perkins. I'll take the baby if you wish me to."

"Well, I'll be jiggered," murmured the woman again. "So you've swapped places. What'll yer ma say, and yer pa?"

"They are away until Saturday. I—I am going back then," said Helen.

"Oh, ye be," observed the woman, with a sneer. "Well, I wouldn't wonder if ye did," and she threw back her head with another laugh.

Zionism

ON another page will be found an article by Mr. A. Wadhams, on the prophetic aspect of the Zionist movement to acquire control of the Holy Land by Dr. Herzl and other Jewish leaders. As will be seen, Mr. Wadhams believes that the movement is not such as the prophets predicted, and is consequently foredoomed to failure.

The latest news of the movement is that the negotiations with the Sultan have been halted by some difficulty that has not been explained. It may be, therefore, that the movement will prove a failure, but we do not think that the passages Mr. Wadhams quotes, prove that it will be so. They prove only that at the final consummation the ten tribes will be found united with the Jews. They do not say that all the tribes will return at the same time. Indeed, Zechariah explicitly states (12: 7) that "the Lord will save the tents of Judah first," so that, so far from prophecy indicating that Zionism will fail, it leads us to expect stages in the return, and that the first stage will be the one contemplated by Zionism, of a return of the Jews before the ten tribes.

The character of the Zionist programme also is in line with prophecy. Jeremiah says (32: 42-44), "So will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them; and fields shall be bought in this land . . . men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences, and seal them, and take witnesses in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah . . . for I will cause their captivity to return, saith the Lord." Perhaps this may have had a partial fulfilment at the return from Babylon, but as the people had been away only seventy years, it is probable that very little land was purchased, as each family would claim its ancestral possession. Zionism, however, is based on the plan of sale or lease, which exactly fits Jeremiah's prediction.

The fact that prophecy describes the union between the Jews and the ten tribes without describing the events which will lead to the union or mentioning the interval between these events is not unusual. The suffering and the millennial reign of Messiah are described as if they were in close sequence, though nineteen hundred years have already elapsed between them. The prophets looked at the future as a traveler looks at distant mountains, the peaks of which appear to him in close contiguity, though they may be separated by wide valleys that he cannot see. So in Zionism we may be witnessing the saving of the tents of Judah, between which and the gathering of the whole of Jacob there may be a long interval. It would be rash, therefore, to infer that because Zionism does not include in its programme the return of the ten tribes that it is foredoomed to failure.

The Rainy Day

A CHARM of its own is possessed by the rainy day. You waken in the morning to the sweetest of all music, the steady patter of rain upon the roof; you look out the window and see the silver slant of the falling drops. If you are in the country, you are glad to note how trees and grass and grain respond to the grateful showers, how the leaves shine with the moisture and the earth greedily drinks it in, while on the distant hills floats a soft veil, not so thick as mist, but tenuous and diaphanous as the drapery of a bride. The birds are out of sight. You wonder if they like it, too, this down drop of wet on their nests among the boughs and deep in the meadow grass. When the sun comes forth again, they will sing the sweeter melodies for the quiet of these hours.

To the housewife a rainy day is indeed a boon. It gives her time for the big task of sewing that has been waiting for a period of leisure. She gets out that old poplin that she has been meaning to make over, and she rips, and turns, and brushes it, and sits down secure in the consciousness that no one will disturb her when the weather is so inclement. The book agent will not venture forth, nor the dearest friend intrude to-day. If she is an author, deep in the middle of her latest book, she will adjust the lives and the misunderstandings of hero and heroine in absolute peace on the rainy day. An artist, her colors and her brushes will serve her well, and the gray light suit her better than the fierce sunshine.

As for the children, the wise mother has rainy-day pleasures in reserve for them. Scrap-books, with scissors and paste; soap-bubbles, with a large bowl and several pipes; paper-dolls, building-blocks, all sorts of toys that are not taken out in nice weather, come from the top shelf, or the bureau drawer, and make the little ones jubilant. Only the woman who has no resources, does not know what to do with the children on a rainy day.

On such a day, a peculiarly tempting hot supper should be spread for the man who comes home hungry, shivering and wet. For never is home so lovely as on a very rainy night.

False Messiahs

FROM England comes the news of the appearance in that country of a "false Christ"—a man who claims to be the incarnate Son of God returned to earth. This claimant, Pigott, by name, would seem to be the legitimate successor of a noted spiritual impostor, Henry James Prince, who, some forty years ago, stirred up the United Kingdom by the boldness and arrogance of his impious pretensions. Doubtless, Pigott, like all his predecessors, will wax and wane, and finally disappear in a gloom more or less Stygian and malodorous, while the poor, credulous dupes whom he has deceived, will be painfully disillusioned, when they realize into what a deep pit of error they have been led. "Take heed," said Jesus, "that ye be not deceived, for many shall come in my name, saying: I am Christ. . . . Go ye not therefore after them." Of the day of his coming, "knoweth no man, no not the angels of heaven, but my Father only," he has assured us. But when that divinely ordained moment has come, it will not be in humble wise, as in Bethlehem, that he will come again; but his return will be in the most public manner possible, that all the earth may know. "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" he has told us, "and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn; and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory."

Hardly an age has passed, since the close of the first century of the Christian era, which has not seen a "false Christ." Nearly thirty are well known to history, from the first impostor, Simeon, in the Roman Emperor Hadrian's time, down to our own latter-day Schweinfurth, Schlatter, Prince, Pigott, and the rest. Simeon involved the Jewish nation in war, and finally fell on the battlefield amid dreadful slaughter. Moses Cretensis, in the reign of Theodosius, led his dupes—men, women and children—to a rock, and persuaded so many to leap into the sea that their fate turned the others against him. Dunaan, the next pretended Messiah, was another bloodthirsty monster. Julian and Serenus also strove to establish their claims to Messiahship by the sword, but both ended ignominiously. So with the false Messiah in Persia in 1138, and another at Cordova, Spain, in 1157. The latter was the cause of nearly all the Jews in Spain being destroyed. David Alroi, the famous false Messiah who brought disaster to the Jews in Fez in the middle of the twelfth century, and Almasser and David-el-David, in the same century, all involved thousands of their race in their own downfall when they perished.

David Reubeni, Sabbathai Zebi, and later, in our own time, the Bedouin Messiah of Sana in Yemen, who received homage from many Oriental lands; the impostor Jekuthiel, who appeared in Germany in 1872, and proposed to assume the throne of empire as the veritable Messiah—all these and many more have counted their dupes by tens of thousands.

Some of the earlier impostors had careers that were meteoric. A few were mere vulgar, brazen-faced blasphemers, who pretended to be miracle-workers, and who, assuming the Divine name, drew multitudes after them. Others, ambitious of political power, stirred up sedition through their claims of divinity, and brought thousands of dupes to a miserable death. There were still others concerning whom it would be charitable to conclude that they were simply madmen, and mentally irresponsible. Pigott, who declares himself to be "the Son of God come in my own body, come to please my people; to give everlasting life to all flesh," probably belongs to this category. He is probably a monomaniac whose frenzy has unhinged his reason. It is characteristic of the weakness and credulity of human nature that the exposure and collapse of such claimants does not deter other adventurers from successfully attempting the same imposition and deceiving multitudes for time, just as Prince did and Pigott is now doing. It is inevitable, apparently, that "false Messiahs" will continue to appear; but the Christian who studies his Bible and who keeps steadily in remembrance the words of Christ, should not be deceived by such impostors. When Jesus comes, his followers and the whole world will know it. It will be no guess-work, no doubtful claim, no mere hope. All the earth will acknowledge Him who comes "with power and great glory" to rule over his own.

The Atmosphere of the Soul

WHAT a dull, dreary climate do we make in our souls through want of faith. How rarely do we have a day of spiritual clearness in which we can see the things that are beyond the world of sense.

Art critics speak of some pictures as wanting in a atmosphere. They are painted on the flat surface, and do not stand out living from the canvas, with the fre air and sunshine about them. They have no sense of breadth and freeness. We are oppressed when we look at them. So for the most part are our lives. There is no atmosphere of heaven about them; they have no perspective; they are of the earth earthy. We live in our cares, we are buried in our troubles; we beat our hours of misery apart from the rest of our life, an apart from the blessed prospects of eternity. Oh, for a clearer atmosphere of the soul! Oh, for a stronger faith, to give us a wider horizon, and bring the vision of the Great White Throne into our everyday life! Out of the thralldom of worldly things! Then in the time of temptation we shall be able to overcome, because no present gain or pleasure will weigh anything against the future good. Then in the time of sorrow our eyes will be able to take in the whole of life, in this world and the which is to come, and to see in its darkest lines only the contrast which gives effect and brilliancy to the beautiful design, and works out the pattern of God's eternal love.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Town Transferred

ONE of the most sudden and extraordinary movements on record is reported from Oklahoma. The new land was opened by the Government on August 25. Within three days the vacant country had become the site of a flourishing town, which had in it all the promise of becoming, in the near future, an important city. In that short period it became able to boast of possessing a bank, a post-office, a newspaper, an hotel and several stores. A census of the town showed a population of three thousand persons. It might have been impossible with the means at the disposal of the citizens to build in so short a time as three days the edifices named, however unsubstantial might have been the building that would have satisfied the settlers, but as a matter of fact they were removed to the site bodily. The citizens of Thomas decided that the new site which the Government had made available was a better site for a city than the one then occupied. They, therefore, quickly prepared the foundations, and moved the buildings they then used to their new location. The removal of the large hotel was the most difficult problem, but twenty-four horses were attached to it and it was drawn over the prairie safely to its new site. The newspaper office was moved, with all its machinery, to the new scene, and in three days from the day of opening, the Thomas Tribune was ready to receive advertisements and begin its journalistic career in the new location. Of course the fact that the journey was over a level prairie facilitated the operation, but the energy and enterprise represented by the wholesale removal to constitute a record probably unequalled in any other country. We wish that among the buildings brought there had been a church, but doubtless one will be built. The settlers will need it. It is true that John noticed that the New Jerusalem conned no temple; but in this world no city can afford to do without a place of worship.

Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, that ye may hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye are in the land whither ye go to possess it (Deut. 31: 12, 13).

The Penalty of Fidelity

A New Jersey Baptist Church has had a peculiar experience, according to the report of the local journals. The members and friends of the church, considering themselves aggrieved by a number of visiting ministers, passed and executed sentence on the offenders with all the vigor and authority of a court of justice. The visitors had assembled to ordain the minister who had accepted the invitation to the church. The usual statement of principles was made by the candidate, and at its close, the Moderator announced that there would be an interval to allow the ministers present to hold an executive session. Reporters were not admitted to that conference, and no one present would disclose the proceedings, but their nature might be inferred from the Moderator's announcement when the public meeting was resumed. It said that the ordination ceremony stood indefinitely postponed. The consternation of the members and friends of the church when the announcement was made was extreme. They were disappointed, and held an informal meeting, at which it was decided that the entertainment of the visiting ministers should also be indefinitely postponed. The visitors accordingly had the option of going to the hotel and paying for their own dinners, or returning home with their hunger unsatisfied. It may be assumed that in deciding not to proceed with the ordination they obeyed the dictates of their consciences. To do so, has in past history sometimes involved martyrdom, so the ministers were in glorious company, trifling as the penalty was, and they would doubtless have no hesitation in answering their expected hosts, as the apostles answered the ecclesiastical authorities:

Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye (Acts 4: 19.)

To Identify Commuters

One of the Railroad companies of New England has recently issued a notice to its season-ticket holders, which implies a suspicion that the road has suffered from breaches of faith. It announces that in future all persons who apply for season tickets between points an outcropping of coal in Santiago Canyon. They had been working for some time at some distance apart, when one of them noticed a break in the ledge of earth overhanging the place where they stood. He knew that in a few moments an avalanche of soil would fall, and shouted to his comrade to run for his life. Supposing his warning would be heeded, he jumped to a place of safety, but on looking back he saw, to his horror, that the man had not moved, but stood gazing intently at something on the side of the hill. Presently, as he had foreseen, the ledge fell, burying his friend under it. He worked with might and main to dig him out and eventually succeeded, but found him unconscious from pain and suffocation. Medical assistance was procured and the man came to himself, but his injuries are said to be serious. He explained his failure to move when he heard his comrade's warning, by the fact that a large rattlesnake had thrust his head out from a crevice in a rock immediately in front of him, and the gaze of the reptile had hypnotized him so that he could not move. He knew his danger but he was like one paralyzed under the spell of the snake's eyes. It seems marvelous that the snake should have such power as to hold a man powerless in the presence of such imminent peril. Still more astonishing is it that sinful fascination holds so many persons powerless when their eternal life is in danger, and prevents their availing themselves of the sure way of escape.

O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth? (Gal. 3: 1.)

To Change His Name

An application has been made to the Supreme Court in New York by a citizen of Brooklyn, for permission to change his name. Some surprise was manifested by the judge at the request, as the name the applicant desired to abandon is an ancient one, highly honored in Germany and with an excellent record in this country. The man persisted, however, in urging his application, and explained that the name had been disgraced by his father, who had been convicted of gross misconduct in a case recently before the courts. The son said he knew of his own personal knowledge that his father was justly convicted, and as the case had attained notoriety in the city and State, he was anxious to be relieved of a name which had become infamous. He was, moreover, about to be married, and he shrank from the thought of giving the disgraced name to the lady of his choice and to the possible children of the marriage. After this explanation his request was granted. So the name once honorable has, been blotted out, and the prediction of the ancient seer has been fulfilled.

His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street (Job 18: 17).

BRIEF NOTES

We regret to learn that the London Missionary Society's schooner, the Southern Cross, has been wrecked on the Island of Tahiti. Providentially no lives were lost.

An interesting service was held in New York, on Sept. 23, to celebrate the forty-fifth anniversary of the Fulton St. Prayer meeting. Mr. F. H. Jacobs, the Superintendent, invited well-known ministers to take part in the celebration.

A Young Men's Christian Association has been organized in the City of Mexico, with a membership of 200. The forty-room building it occupies, surrounded by a half-acre garden filled with tropical trees and shrubs, was once a fine old family residence. The United States and Canada railroad associations contributed $1,400 to its establishment, and three prominent Americans of Mexico pledged themselves for the annual $3,000 rental.

The protest sent by the Hon. John Hay, our Secretary of State, to Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Austria and Turkey, against the treatment the Jews are receiving in Roumania, receives the hearty approbation of the American people. Those powers are sponsors for Roumania, and as they, in signing the Treaty of Berlin, gave the country national independence, they should see that she fulfils the conditions imposed on her. In the interest of humanity, we hope Mr. Hay's protest will be heeded.

involving a payment of fifty dollars and upwards, must send with the application their photographs and autographs. These, it appears, are to be reproduced on their tickets, so that when a passenger shows a season ticket to the conductor, that officer has only to compare the likeness on the ticket with the appearance of the person presenting it, in order to discover whether the passenger is the actual holder of the season ticket, or has only borrowed it from the owner to avoid paying fare. Doubtless some who have been accustomed to use other persons' tickets will now cease doing so, for fear of detection. It is much to be wished that in a matter of infinitely greater importance there too might be genuine reform. Those who think that because they are the

Buried While Under a Spell

A singular accident occurred recently in California. Two men went from Whittier, in that State, to inspect not understand. The Jews have not escaped this tendency, especially in lands where they have been excluded from the schools and colleges. The Jews of America have thus been astonished to find that their brethren, tended to be obeyed literally. In a scholarly work, by Rev. Bernhard Pick, D.D., some of these are described with pictures, which we have permission to reproduce.

PHYLACTERY FOR FOREHEAD

One of the quaintest ceremonies is observed on Yom Kippur, the great Day of Atonement, the most sacred day of the Jewish year. For several days before the ushering in of the great day, the Jewish markets are full of crates containing live chickens, which are sold for Caparas. Poor, indeed, is that Jew of the Orthodox school, who does not purchase a chicken for each member of his family. For the father, and each of his sons, a male bird is procured; for the mother, and each of her daughters, a hen is bought, in order that there may be a sacrifice for every member of the household. At the time appointed, on the day before Yom Kippur, the chickens are assigned to the respective persons. It is held over the head of the person for whom it is appointed, and is then swung around the head three times, while a formula is chanted to a weird tune. The formula consists of Hebrew words, implying that the sins of the person have been transferred to the bird, which is then slaughtered. Thus the idea of substitution and of atonement by vicarious suffering, which is the keynote of Christianity, is presented in vivid form. It is a significant commentary on the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which holds up the infinite value of the one sublime Sacrifice in the person of Christ, which renders all other sacrifice unnecessary.

A solemn occasion, which is always anticipated with great interest, especially in the Synagogues of London, is the blessing pronounced upon the worshipers by men who claim to be able to trace their pedigree to Aaron, the first High Priest. These men, with their heads covered by the sacred sheets, utter in Hebrew the benediction which has been transmitted from father to son through the centuries.

THE GREAT TALITH, WORN AT PRAYER

Quaint Symbols of the Ancient Faith

SIGNIFICANT CUSTOMS AND OBSERVANCES IN THE JEWISH WORLD

IN all ages, and among all races, there is a tendency to substitute the observance of rites and ceremonies for the true heart-worship that God requires. It is noteworthy, too, that when education declines, and any race or class is excluded from the sources of knowledge, the people who suffer are apt to lay all the greater emphasis on observances, the meaning of which they do

One of the pictures on this page is of the mezuza. This is a cylinder of metal with an aperture in the side covered by glass. It contains a piece of parchment inscribed on one side with certain passages from the book of Deuteronomy. On the other side is written the ineffable name of Jehovah, and the parchment is so folded as that the name is visible through the glass. The cylinder is attached to the right hand door-post of the Jewish home. It is believed to have the virtue of an amulet, and is saluted by pious Jews both on entering and leaving the home. The practice is doubtless a survival of obedience to the command (Deut. 11: 20) "Thou shalt write them [the words of the law] upon the door-posts of thine house and upon thy gates; that your days may be multiplied and the days of your children."

The great and small Talith, of which pictures appear on this page, are a species of mantle worn by the Jews when reciting passages of Scripture in the Synagogue or during prayer. Originally it was a large, oblong piece of cloth, with a hole in the centre through which the head was put, thus dividing it in half, one-half covering the front and the other the back of the body, like a tunic. It is usually made of white woolen material, with three or more blue stripes at each edge. Some of them are now made of silk. The wearing of the great Talith became so conspicuous a distinction of ostentation that our Lord rebuked (Matt. 23: 5) when he charged them with enlarging the borders of their garments.

The phylactery, which is worn by orthodox Jews on the forehead and left arm during prayer, is a small box made of parchment or black calf-skin. It contains slips of parchment or vellum on which certain passages from the Pentateuch are inscribed. They usually are Exodus 13: 1-10, which treats of the sanctification of the first-born, describes the celebration of the Passover, and concisely relates the deliverance from Egypt; Exodus 13: 11-16, regulating phylacteries; Deut. 6: 4-9, which summarizes the law and commands the use of the phylactery; and Deut. 6: 13-22, which forbids idolatry, and directs the instruction of children in the history of the great deliverance. The command as to the use of the symbol is: "Thou shalt bind them for sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes." The slip of parchment on which the passages are inscribed is rolled up and tied with the well-washed hairs of a calf and put into the box. A flap connected with the brim is then drawn down and sewed to the base of the box in such a manner as to form a loop through which passes a leather strap by which the phylactery is bound to the left arm. The phylactery for the forehead has on the outside, on the right, the Hebrew initial for the name of Jehovah, and on the left, the initial of the word Sabbath. The contents of the phylactery for the head are the same as those for the arm, but in the former each of the four passages is in a cell for itself, while the phylactery for the arm contains only one cell in which the passages are put together. The phylactery for the arm is fastened to the inner arm near the elbow, so that it is close to the heart. The strap must pass seven times around the arm, three times around the middle finger and the remainder of the strap around the hand.

The ordinary size of the box is one and a half inches, but there is no restriction. The Pharisees increased the size, and by so doing brought down on them our Lord's denunciation, "They multiply their phylacteries" (Matt. 23: 5), not because it was a breach of the law, but because they did so to attract notice and to the respect of people who would think them pious. Many quaint usages have grown up and still cling about the modern observance of the Feast of Tabernacles. It was the festival of the harvest, described as the Feast of the Ingathering in Exodus 23: 16. Where it is possible booths are erected, in which each orthodox Jew lives during the seven days of the festival to commemorate the time when his fathers dwelt in tents or tabernacles. He provides himself with a bunch of palm and of citron, which he takes with him to the synagogue. At the beginning of the observance, the citron is turned upside down and the palm is waved three times toward the East, West, North and South, while certain Psalms are chanted. Afterwards there is a procession headed by the chief officer of the synagogue, who carries a scroll of the law, and the others follow with their branches, marching around the Ark, which is placed temporarily in the middle of the synagogue. Similar observances take place on the following days until the seventh day, which is called the Great Hosanna. On this day each Jew carries a bunch of willows, from which he beats off the leaves during the service. The seven scrolls are taken out of the Ark and a lighted candle placed in it.

the Jew, that it marked him out for ill-treatment in lands and times of persecution. Its use in public was therefore discarded, but it was worn in the Synagogue, though its shape was somewhat altered, making it more like a scarf. The small Talith was substituted for ordinary wear, and became an under-garment, which no orthodox Jew would be without. A special prayer is recited when it is put on.

The fringe of the Talith has a significance of its own. Its use is enjoined in Numbers 15: 38, but the directions there given were elaborated by the teachers of the law. The fringe was to have eight white threads. One of the threads was to be wound around the other seven, seven times and knotted, then eight times and again knotted, then eleven times and finally thirteen times. These numbers gave the numerical value of the letters of the phrase, "Jehovah is one," which was the keynote of Monotheism. Finally the five knots represented the five books of Moses. The Rabbis laid great stress on the law of the fringe, which they held to be one of the most important in the whole code.

Special reverence was paid to these fringes or tassels. It was the fringe, not the hem, of Christ's garment which the woman with the issue of blood touched (Matt. 9: 20) and that the men of Gennesaret touched (Matt. 14: 36) as they sought healing. They thus connected the sacred symbol with the sanctity of Christ's person. The Pharisees made the fringes very large and conspicuous in order to give the impression of superior piety. It was this

HIS GRAPHIC STORY OF HIS EXPERIENCES AMONG THE LITTLE KNOWN "MOUNTAIN WHITES" OF THE CUMBERLANDS — A STRANGE PEOPLE AND THEIR WAYS

[As announced last week, Major-Gen. O. O. Howard begins in this issue, the remarkable story of his twelve-days' journey through the steep and craggy Cumberland Mountains, and his experiences among the picturesque mountain folk, concerning whom so little is known by Americans generally, and who have been widely misunderstood and misrepresented. The General's record of his sojourn among the "Mountain Whites," reveals for the first time the real characteristics of the mountaineers, their intense natures and rare courage, their temperate habits and simple homes, their abounding hospitality and their readiness to welcome the Gospel. There are many other things, too, which the General's letters will disclose, and which no reader should miss. General Howard, who was accompanied by the Rev. E. O. Guerrant and Mr. Stark, undertook the journey exclusively for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.]

set out this afternoon (Friday), and I will give you the detail as we, like Jonah in Nineveh, progress through the great city, the city of rugged hills and high mountain peaks.

I wish your readers, before looking in upon the mountain-folk, could see this region, and especially this Kentucky home—a home not luxurious, for missionaries cannot be millionaires; but a home ample, amid grand old trees, many locusts, cherries, black walnuts, with splendid evergreens out in front. It is a family full of Christian love, hospitality and activity. One son follows the law, another medicine, while the third carries on the rich home farm of eighty acres. This is a good point, is it not, to start from, in order to carry good tidings to the mountains?

A TWELVE-DAYS' PROGRAMME

Our schedule for a twelve-days' journey into the roughest parts of Kentucky

A.M. and 4 P.M. (Laurel Point is in Perry County). We also have an appointment there Thursday morning at 10 A.M. Elkatawa, Breathitt County, Friday, Sept. 12, at 4 P.M.; Athol (in Lee County), Saturday, Sept. 13, at 10 A.M.; Elkatawa again on Sunday, Sept. 14, at 10 A.M. and 4 P.M. The last appointment in the present programme is at Jackson, the capital of Breathitt County, Monday, Sept. 15, at 1 P.M.

I find the weather delightfully cool, and everything propitious for undertaking our mountain work.

Major-General U. S. Army, retired.

A Little Mountain Village

ELKATAWA, KY., September 6.

This is a little village in a canyon. Facing east, there are mountains within a stone's throw to the right of you, and mountains to the left of you. All along, the cucumber tree. The corn, grows to ten and twelve feet, and vegetables just here are in abundance. The soil is so rich that everything that you find in the gardens of the "Blue Grass region" is easily produced here. The school-house is at the west end of the line of frame buildings, and encloses, on week days, a teacher and an average of sixty scholars.

A MOUNTAIN FIDDLER

OVER THE MOUNTAIN ROADS

This building was used for a church for the people of the village and of the surrounding valleys and mountains. They flock in from every direction, coming down the steep paths and trails on horses and mules. Lately Dr. Guerrant has had a large tent put up for religious services, and a small church is under construction.

Elkatawa is a centre for all sorts of operations, besides the agriculture essential for support. A little girl said to me just now, "Over on yon creek, some miles away, they saw the ties." "Have you been there?" "Oh, no, I never; 'tis on Mill Creek, over yon hill."

We must ride now from Elkatawa, ten miles to Canoe, for to-morrow's services. We sat to-day at the table with the missionary workers. South Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky were represented at the table. Rev. Dr. Saunders, in whose house we are, is away on missionary duty. His cheerful wife and Mrs. Gordon welcomed us; that is, Dr. Guerrant and daughter, General Howard and two young ministers, one from Canoe (Mr. Stormont) and one from Ridgewood Junction (Mr. Henry).

FEUDS DYING OUT

The happy union of these good people in their hard field is delightful to witness. Children and grown people are coming to them and their teaching from every direction. Feuds and quarrels diminish and in many places disappear altogether, as the direct result of their good missionary work. We hope that the 120 children who are here part of the time are getting rid of that belief in revenge, which must be conquered before this splendid mountain people can live as Christians ought to live—that is, in love and fellowship.

We ride to Canoe, on mule and horseback, this afternoon. O. O. HOWARD.

and crowds of the mountain youth, in whom, Dr. Guerrant for the Soul Winners and I for my Grant-Lee College (Lincoln Memorial) are so deeply interested.

The opening up of the country to schools and churches by Dr. Guerrant and his splendidly organized army of workers, dotting the mountains and valleys in groups, has carried with it, along with simple and true teaching, especially to the young women, charming hats and neat though simple clothing. Nature has done the rest. A more beautiful set of young people could not be found in New York or Philadelphia. They are bright, animated, energetic and apparently reasonably contented.

Such were some of my conclusions on the train. But Dr. Guerrant said: "Don't judge us, General, by these, for they have had several years of greater advantages than those you are to visit."

Dr. Stormont with Wellee Turner behind him on the same horse; Miss Anne, mounted on her horse "Speckles," and Gen. Howard on a tall sorrel called "Taylor" with extemporized saddle-bags under him, set out for Canoe ten miles distant. We were to climb up Cane Creek to the summit of a range, and then go down, following Canoe Creek. The creek valleys are too narrow for cultivation, and are just now dry. It is, like all the Cumberland Mountains, a vast wilderness of hills and peaks.

The road was rough enough, but good for a horse trail. Miss Anne's horse lay down twice, but she was so athletic a horsewoman that she sprang and cleared danger each time. The horse simply rolled over the first time to ease the pain of a wounded back, and browsed the second time as if in fun. The rider then sprang up, and sat on a meal-bag sideways behind the minister.

At last we struck the opening where we found the Canoe hamlet. I paced the breadth of it this morning from mountain to mountain. It is 400 yards each way. Four steep acclivities run up from 800 to 12,000 feet. There are six or seven houses to make up the hamlet. Mr. Callahan has a store, and all that pertains to a home, to go with it. He and his good wife and children entertain us. He takes care of the tall missionary (Mr. Stormont), wife and child, in a little separate cottage.

A LONG DELAYED FUNERAL

The church is over against the store at the smallest mountain edge. Sunday School begins about 9 o'clock, and then comes the church service. This morning, seeing the people winding along the road, singly and in groups, in their Sunday best, we found that they were going to the funeral of a Mr. Stamper, two miles away. A young man died a year ago, but they waited according to custom, and wanted a Baptist minister, and so, as in the case of Abraham Lincoln's mother, Nancy Hanks Lincoln, the funeral was held long after the death.

I suggested a postponement of our morning service here, and an adjournment to the funeral—that I might give your readers as good an account as I could of an assemblage of such a peculiar character.

My suggestion resulted in two distinct morning services. Dr. Guerrant came up over the long trail, he and the minister held Sunday School, and then the preaching service at the Canoe Chapel, while Miss Anne and I, with some young people, in a stout mule wagon, having two outriders, followed the larger crowd over the Middle Fork (of the Kentucky River), then up the Fork with its singular mountain banks for two miles. Immense trees, principally the sycamore and the beech, interspersed with cedars, reared the shore and afford grand shade on a hot day like this. We turned up a dry creek, bed paved with loose stones and called by the historic name of Sebastian. All along, half-a-mile apart, we found homes like that in which Abraham Lincoln was born, that is—of logs, with an outside chimney. They are picturesque, on account of the rich variety of shrubs and vines which surround them. Wherever there was a space that could be planted, at the foot of an acclivity, or ascending it halfway, there was corn—very abundant this year. It seems the only reliable crop in the mountains proper.

A STRANGE GATHERING

Arriving at the place near which the funeral was to be held, we saw a large number of saddle horses hitched along the ravine, and sprinkling the open woods to our right. Our party, dismounting, passed on up a steep slope and came suddenly upon a beautiful little cemetery. Just above this were some two hundred of the mountain people of every age. Benches had been arranged for some; a group of Baptist ministers, of the olden type, seemed to be sitting upon one bench, so placed as to make them face down the slope. Beyond these benches, which were central, all around was the multitude leaning against the trees or sitting upon the ground. Little children were sleeping upon the saddle-bags, and some boys kept themselves a little aloof to have a quiet talk. Amid the sunbonnets and gray clothing, scarlet for the girls and small children prevailed.

THE OLD MOUNTAIN PREACHER

This congregation was a study. It was picturesque in the extreme. Many noble-looking and devout women were quiet and attentive; an aged native minister, after a remarkable hymn, which had been "lined out" and sung with exceeding pathos, took his text, "All flesh is grass," etc. He was eloquent. The good old story was in his sermon, and I think many a minister would like to have the power he showed, in calling the young people from nature's darkness to the great light revealed by the Gospel.

My conclusion, as I beheld the scene, was this: "These things ought ye to have done, but not leave the others undone." If the children could only have the simple and faithful teaching that they ought to have, this emotional preaching would but enhance their hopes and joys. Dr. Guerrant and his workers (Soul Winners) seem to me to combine the two—namely, intelligent teaching and Gospel preaching.

AN INTERESTING SERVICE

In the afternoon our little church at Canoe was well filled with men, women and children. Many married women from necessity brought their babies with them, and they succeeded well in keeping them quiet. Miss Anne played the organ, and the majority united in our grand old songs of Zion. These Gospel hymns have been learned within two years from the Soul Winners. Before the meeting the women crowded in to hear Miss Anne play and sing. This is an immeasurable uplift.

Next, Dr. Stormont (who is from Mississippi and gives his vacation here), prayed simply and earnestly for true blessings, and then Dr. Guerrant took the first Psalm of David and preached a sermon as he went from clause to clause, with a rapidity and earnestness, and an eloquence which few men ever attain. His contrast between the reward of the righteous and the fate of the persistent wicked was strongly drawn and emphasized. His illustrations came straight from the country round about. Some of them were vivid and startling, but always effective.

General Howard followed with an address on the great Father love, and the how to come into unison with it for boys and girls, and men and women.

SIX CHILDREN TO A HOUSEHOLD

At the close Dr. Guerrant made a strong appeal to the people to rise up as near to self-support for their Sunday School and their church as they could. Many made a promise to give one dollar per month. My heart ached for them, for I could realize from long experience the struggle which poor people have to raise that dollar. Still, we know that the sacrifice does them good, as it does your readers good to make such sacrifices for the benefit of any heavenly work. You would never let the Soul Winners want, if I had the power to present to you this remarkable mountain field, where the average, through the whole district, is six children to a household—children as beautiful and as promising as your own.

I am more and more convinced of the similarity of Dr. Guerrant's extension of simple Christian teaching, and that of ours in the same mountains, from Cumberland Gap, as a centre, and I earnestly hope that Christians will make large sacrifices for this noble home work.

We Meet Again

(A Convention Hymn)

W. I. S.

Melody in Unison.

W. I. SOUTHERTON.

1. We meet a-gain with hearts a-flame, To praise the dear Redeemer's name
2. We thank our Sav-iour and our Lord For all the sweetness of His word,—
3. O teach us, Lord, in this glad hour The greatness of Thy Spirit's power;
4. Be with us in our ev-ery home, Be with us in the days to come;

With voic-es full of love and song: Be-hold a hap-py throng!
The Cross at which we laid our sin, The crown we hope to win.
Reign Thou su-preme in ev-ery heart—The King of Love Thou art.
May "Saved to Serve" our mot-to be, While working still for Thee.

FULL CHORUS.

Then shout a-loud, while hills a-round Re-ech-o with a joy-ful sound:

"Let Christ be King! let Christ be King! To Him our praise we bring."

'Twas Mother!

WHO was it kissed the babe to sleep?
'Twas mother!
Who rocked the cradle, laughed and wept
As thoughts of baby's future crept
O'er heart as wondrous as the deep?
'Twas mother!

Who wiped away the darling's tears?
'Twas mother!

Who clasped the fondling to her heart,
And cared most for it from the start,
Who loved it through the changing years?
'Twas mother!

Who watched you grow a sprightly youth?
'Twas mother!

Who cured you of your stupid airs
And breathed your name in silent prayers,
Who taught you words of heavenly truth?
'Twas mother!

Who gave you counsel sound and sweet?
'Twas mother!

Who soothed the bitter hours of life
And calmed your heart in manhood's strife,
As guardian angel watched your feet?
'Twas mother!

One beauteous face you ne'er forget—
'Tis mother's!

No matter where you rove on earth,
No matter if of lowly birth,
That loving face is with you yet—
'Tis mother's!

And now thy hair is silver gray—
Dear mother!

The evening shades are hovering round,
But God's great love doth still abound,
T will give thee strength till life's last day—
Dear mother!

And memories sweet will never die,
Dear mother!
Thy stroke of love upon the brow,
Thy gentle words are with me now,
They tune my heart as years roll by—
Dear mother!

When time is lost in endless day,
Dear mother!
When loved ones meet and part no more—
In purest light on boundless shore,
God will thy love and life repay—
Dear mother! T. B. BARRATT.

Rules of Living

Hugh Peters, an English preacher of the seventeenth century, left as a legacy to his daughter, in the year 1660, some rules of living, of which other persons would reap the benefit, if they would conform to his excellent standard. Whosoever would live long and blessedly, let him observe these following rules, by which he shall obtain that which he desireth.

"Let thy Thoughts be divine, awful, godly; let thy Talk be little, honest, true; let thy Works be profitable, holy, charitable; let thy Manners be grave, courteous, cheerful; let thy Diet be temperate, convenient, frugal; let thy Apparel be sober, neat, comely; let thy Will be confident, obedient, ready; let thy Sleep be moderate, quiet, seasonable; let thy Prayers be short, devout, often, fervent; let thy Recreation be lawful, brief, seldom; let thy Memory be of death, punishment, glory." ZIONISM

...The Prophetic Aspect of the Movement to Promote the Return of the Jewish People to their Own Land

By A. WADHAMS

SO much has been said of late on these topics in the public prints, that it would seem almost superfluous to attempt the making of any additions to the general subject. The discussion, however, has been mainly from the standpoint taken by the Zionists themselves—that the object of their movement is the establishment of a "Jewish State" in their land of Palestine, provided an arrangement can be made with the power now holding possession of it.

That the return is still in the future is admitted, but the question arises, Is Zionism the form which it will assume, or will it take place under different conditions? The fact that Jews are returning is not to be questioned, for already there are in the land more than came from the Babylonish captivity under Ezra and Nehemiah, numbering probably at this time as many as 60,000, and have quietly been going back, a few at a time, for the last thirty or forty years. This movement, however, cannot be credited to Zionism.

But aside from this, neither Zionism, nor the return of so many, can account for the conditions in which the Jews are to be found ultimately, according to the prophecies concerning them in the Word of God, except, perhaps, that being in the land, in unbelief, not having accepted Jesus as their Messiah, they are yet to undergo the terrible visitation mentioned in the 14th chapter of the Book of Zechariah.

There is only one source of information, in regard to the Jews, that can be relied upon. If these movements are found to be in accord with the Word of God, then are they absolutely true. History, so far, has failed to furnish an explanation, but the word of prophecy does.

It would be considered strange to ask, Who are the Jews? and yet, upon the answer depends a proper understanding of the whole question. The name Jew is mentioned in the Bible for the first time at II. Kings 16: 6, over seven hundred years after the Exodus. Also at chapter 18: 26, but the Second Book of Kings was not written until the return of Judah and Benjamin, after the end of the Babylonian captivity. Mention is also made of the Jews, as such, in Jeremiah 34: 9, and Isaiah 36: 13. This name was never applied to the people of the northern kingdom, but is an abbreviation of the word Judahite, and simply means a descendant of Judah, the head of the tribe of Judah, also known through the Scriptures as the "House of Judah," etc.

The distinction between Judah and Israel is an absolute distinction, and in the respective histories of the "House of Judah" and the "House of Israel," these, with kindred designations, are used to indicate their separate destinies, until the time should arrive when their history would again become one, in the fulfillment of the prophecies concerning them. It is because this distinction between the two houses is overlooked, that the expression "The return of the Jews to Palestine," is so misunderstood, as the Ten Tribes are to return with the Jews, and the Ten Tribes are certainly not Jews, or part of the House of Judah. This will be clearly seen in some quotations from the Scriptures, and as the principle is of general application, it becomes the key to the explanation of over three-fourths of the prophecies of the Old Testament, and they can be read with as clear an understanding as now pertains to the history or the prophecies of the New Testament.

The return to Palestine always involves the return of the whole house of Israel, and not that of the "tribe of Judah"—the "House of Judah," or the "Jews" alone. For proof of this, read the thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, from the beginning as far as verse 14, noting that the entire subject, as mentioned in verse 11, concerns "the whole house of Israel. Verse 14 reads: "And I will put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I will place you in your own land; and ye shall know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it saith the Lord." Verse 16 says: "Take thee one stick, and write upon it,

For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim and for all the house of Israel his companions; and (ver. 17): "Join them . . . that they may become one in thine hand." In verse 19 the Lord says: "Behold I will take the stick of Joseph . . . with the stick of Judah . . . and they shall be one in mine hand;" also verse 21: "Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the nations . . . and bring them into their own land; and (verse 22) "I will make them one nation in the land" . . . one king shall be king to them all, and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms, any more at all. Verse 24: "And my servant David shall be king over them." Verse 25: "And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers dwelt." Verse 26: "I will make . . . an everlasting covenant with them: . . . and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore." Verse 27: "My tabernacle also shall be with them." Verse 28: "And the nations shall know that I am the Lord that sanctify Israel when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore."

Zionism, as a separate movement, is not referred to in the prophecies; on the contrary, the Scriptures declare (Jer. 3: 18), "In those days the house of Judah shall walk with," or, (as the margin reads) "to" the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north, to the land that I gave for an inheritance unto your fathers." This shows conclusively that the "house of Judah" has discovered the lost "house of Israel," and together are proceeding to the land of their former history.
